Senator Croll: The first part I have there is "Liberal Vesting Rules." I tried to avoid the use of the word "Liberal" because here it has no political connotation; it is meant to designate "adequate" and I could not think of another word. Anyway, Liberal vesting rules—at the present time the vesting rule in most provinces is 10-40 years old. In Canada, of course, many workers change their jobs four or five times during their working lives. In those instances where an employee quits before vesting takes place, all he gets is the return of his contributions. The result is that at the end of his working life he has very little if any private pension benefits. The Canada Pension Plan, of course, is different. We have made a suggestion as to how this should be remedied, and it is vital that it be remedied.

• (2140)

The other requirements are universality and non-discrimination, and of course the Canada Pension Plan is available to all workers. The fact that the contributor is a man or a woman makes no difference; colour makes no difference. The only requirement is that one be a worker. The principle of universality is a valuable part of any pension scheme—

Senator Thompson: I wonder if I might ask a question of the honourable senator in respect of pensions and their portability.

Senator Croll: Certainly.

Senator Thompson: You have said that in the private sector there is no portability of pensions. What is the situation as far as persons employed in the public sector are concerned? I am thinking, for example, of an employee of a provincial government who decides to join the federal government. Does that individual have pension portability?

Senator Croll: Yes, a person moving from provincial government employ to federal government employ does have pension portability.

Senator Thompson: And is that true as far as every province is concerned?

Senator Croll: I cannot say definitely, but I believe that to be the case. I can recall going through that problem years ago when I was with the provincial government. It was a bit of a problem then but I do not believe it is today.

Senator Everett: Might I ask a question of the honourable senator? In speaking of the universality and non-discriminatory aspects of the Canada Pension Plan, I believe you mentioned that there was no discrimination on the grounds of sex or race, and you may also have included religion. Do you know of any major private pension plan that discriminates on those grounds?

Senator Croll: As between males and females, of course I do—they all do. Try to get the same rate for a woman that you get for a man and you will find that it is altogether different. They discriminate on the basis that women, on average, live longer than men, as well as for various other reasons.

Senator Everett: Would you mind enlarging on that?

Senator Croll: I would rather not enlarge on it until I have finished. However, the answer I have given you is correct.

Senator Everett: I am sorry you will not enlarge on it, because I think—

Senator Croll: In what respect do you want me to enlarge on it? What else can I say except that there is a difference?

Senator Everett: With respect, I do not think there is any difference in the benefits paid. I do not know of any difference. There may be differences in the rates, but those—

Senator Croll: Of course there are differences in the rates.

Senator Everett: Those are differences in the rates that are paid within the pension plan. The benefits, I think, are the same. I really do not know of any discrimination that exists in a major pension plan.

Senator Croll: Women pay higher rates than do men in similar circumstances.

An Hon. Senator: And they get lower benefits.

Senator Croll: That may be. I am not sure as to that, but certainly I know that they do pay higher rates.

Insofar as portability is concerned, there is complete portability under the Canada Pension Plan. Outside the Canada Pension Plan, there is not much portability. For the most part, pensions cannot be carried from job to job.

The provisions relating to tax deductibility of pension contributions are available to private pension plans, as is indexing. While there is indexing under the Canada Pension Plan, only about 2 or 3 per cent of private pension plans are indexed. There is no indexing in a meaningful sense, and that is one of the things that is very important, particularly to those people who draw pensions.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, might I ask a question of Senator Croll? In light of the fact that Bill C-16 deals with an increase in the guaranteed income supplement under the Old Age Security Act, how does the Canada Pension Plan or the question of discrimination relate?

Senator Croll: You are the last one who should ask that question. I am simply putting this forward as a better way of achieving this than that suggested by the mover of the bill. The better way of doing it is through the pension system, and I thought it very appropriate that I should bring that to the attention of this house. Obviously, the House of Commons, having discussed this thoroughly, thought it appropriate, too.

Senator Marshall: Why do we need concern ourselves with the House of Commons?

Senator Croll: Dealing next with mandatory survivors' benefits, that, to my mind, is very vital. It is particularly vital to female spouses, who are often times left without survivors' benefits.

While I am at it, I might indicate that insofar as the investment in the Canada Pension Plan is concerned, it is a much better investment from the point of view of the individual than is the RRSP. In addition to the fact that an RRSP has front loading on it, the funds are not tied in. Unlike contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, moneys put into an RRSP can be taken out for a nice trip to the Caribbean. In addition, RRSPs are not indexed.

In all of these matters, honourable senators, I think I have indicated that there is a better way of doing it than the way in which the government is going about it at the present time.

Senator Choquette: Is it your intention to propose an amendment to this bill? I take it from all of your remarks that you are not satisfied with this bill in terms of its wording and its purpose and that you have an amendment to present. Is that the situation?

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Croll: You are perfectly right when you say that I am not satisfied, but this is not the time for amendment. I am simply indicating a better course of action that can be taken, and that is to expand the Canada Pension Plan to take in these people, thereby providing them with their own pensions rather than relying upon an increase of $35 or $25 or $15. That is the purpose of the exercise. That is what I am talking about.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a further question of the honourable senator. Would he be prepared to recommend to the sponsor of this bill that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science where he can direct his attention to the changes he recommends and we in the Senate can finally stand on our bloody feet and ensure that legislation is passed for the benefit of the people he supports and to whom he had reference in his report Retirement Without Tears? Is the honourable senator prepared to do that?

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I am in support of this bill and I would vote for it. If the honourable senator wishes to move that it be referred to committee, that's fine, but I am prepared to accept it now. I am merely suggesting that there is a better way of doing it than the course of action being taken at the present time—a much better way, and I thought it would be of interest to the Senate if I indicated exactly what it was I had in mind. I wanted to share with the Senate my views in this regard and to point out that we have a problem here that we have not been able to solve, and we have to do something about it other than what is proposed in this bill—a measure which I described as a band-aid treatment. When they are likely to do anything about it, I don't know. The government has said that it will appoint a pension commission to study the matter.

Senator Marshall: Let's get rid of the bloody problem. Let's stand on our feet in the Senate and do something about it, for cripes sake! Stand on your feet and don't kowtow to the government.

• (2150)

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I don't think anybody should be asking Senator Croll to stand up and be counted. He has stood up and been counted for fifty years.

Senator Marshall: And I stood up and was counted for ten years in the House of Commons. Instead of being a bunch of phonies, it's bloody time—and I don't have to listen to you or anybody else—to stand up here and be counted, to protest legislation that is of no benefit to the people we represent. Don't give me that baloney.

Senator McElman: If you want to harass someone, harass someone like me, a partisan, but don't harass a Canadian like this one.

Senator Marshall: I represent as many people as Senator Croll or you, and I'll stand on my feet to protect the individual rights of the people I represent.

Senator Croll: If you were getting an increase in your pension you would accept it, the same as anyone else would. The people would rather have that than one band-aid approach, and you would not object if you thought about it a second time. But that's up to you.

Senator Marshall: We're going to be thrown out anyway, because we're pussyfooting.

Senator Croll: I have said what I originally set out to say in connection with this, and I have indicated that the government is taking up the question of a commission on pensions very shortly. When we went around talking about poverty, the answer we got half the time was, "Well, this has been studied to death. Why another study?" I indicated to you that there were already eight studies in existence on this very point, demonstrating, in spite of what some of you may think, that this is a vital and important problem. I cannot remember anything that has been so frequently studied in all the years I have been around.

The government intends to go on with this, and go on with it as quickly as possible. What I am suggesting is that we make sure that the government proceeds with respect to the question of pensions, which have been the most neglected aspect of our social security over the years. The pension we recommended is at no cost to the government. It is paid for by the people themselves. As long as people pay for it, we ought to encourage it and welcome it. I hope that the government will get the study—

Senator Marshall: Study be damned!

Senator Croll: —going as quickly as possible, and see that something is done about, first, compulsory retirement, which they are all in agreement with, and, second, the necessity for having a meaningful pension. Any member of Parliament, whether here or any other place, who can sit by and say that $248 is a pension worth considering or talking about—

Senator Marshall: Then stand up on your feet and block the bill.

Senator Croll: Quit gabbling, will you? All we are suggesting is that they double the $248 to $450 or $500 on top of the old age security, which would give a couple another $400 for a total of $900 to $1,000 a month. It is little enough for a man who has worked all his life—

Senator Marshall: Veto the bill.

Senator Croll: —to have at the end of his days.

Senator Marshall: Veto the bill.

Senator Croll: That is my suggestion, and I hope you can see some sense in it. I tell you this: no one has come up with a better solution that I can find. If you look at the American report that just came out last week, you will find they are going in the direction of doubling their social security to give their people some return, in one way or another, rather than starting out on a new course.

It is all very well to say that this is no good, but what else is? I have not heard any suggestions from anybody else for looking after these people—a million of them—that the senator spoke of that are poor and need help. How can you give them help until you set up a system that will work? Well, you can get this system, and it is paid for. I know of no better system, and until such time as someone comes out with a better one we ought to support this bill, which as I have said is merely a band-aid measure—and then do anything else we can to bring comfort and dignity to the vast number of working people in this country.

Senator Godfrey: Will the honourable senator permit a question? I gather from what he has said that he is recommending, instead of the GIS, this extra $35 a month, which would improve the Canada Pension Plan. How would that benefit people who are now over 65 and who do not qualify in any way for the CPP? Under the proposal of your committee it is going to take five years for these increased benefits to come into effect, in any event. How are these people who are now in need going to benefit while they are waiting for that five-year period to elapse?

Senator Croll: I started out by saying that I support the present bill entirely for what it does at the present time, but what I am suggesting is something else that will build for the future. We cannot do it overnight. It will take some time.

Senator Buckwold: I wonder if I could ask a question, not of Senator Croll—although I support everything that he has said—but of the mover of the bill.

The mover glossed over rather quickly the situation with regard to the provincial governments and their supplemental payments under their own laws and regulations. I am not sure whether the question can be answered by Senator Bird, but I would like to know why it is that only two provinces have agreed not to cut down on their payments. I presume that is what Senator Bird meant by what she said. I believe the two provinces in question are Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Senator Bird: No, Nova Scotia and British Columbia.

Senator Buckwold: I am sorry. Those two provinces have said that they will not cut down on what they pay for supplemental old age security, but the other provinces have not responded. It would be a shameful thing if the federal government turned around and paid the absolutely necessary and minimum $35 a month, at a cost of some hundreds of millions of dollars, only to find it taken away by the provinces. I wonder whether we could get some detail with regard to where this matter stands, as to what is the position of the provinces, as to what kind of correspondence or negotiations are going on, and whether it is likely that what we think will be going to old age pensioners, who need it so desperately, will end up in the treasuries of the provincial governments.

Senator Bird: I will certainly take notice of this. As far as I can find out—and I have been asked this question a number of times—the minister has written to his counterparts in the provinces and has had replies from only two. There is no way of knowing what the other provinces are going to do, but I will try to find out. I tried to find out this morning, but so far there have been no more replies. One cannot force people to answer, of course. I can only hope that public opinion is so strong that the provinces will not deprive these poor people of these benefits.

Senator Buckwold: I appreciate the difficulty of obtaining responses, but I would hope there would be more than just discussions. If we cannot be assured that this benefit will end up in the pockets of those who need it, we should take a very careful look at the legislation with respect to those provinces who are not going to co-operate.

Senator Bird: I don't know yet whether they are not going to co-operate, but I will do my best to find out.

• (2200)

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question on this matter? Would it be possible before conclusion of the debate for us to know the terms of the letter from the minister, the Honourable Monique Bégin, to the various provincial governments?

Senator Bird: I shall try to find that out, senator.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, before debate on second reading of the bill is adjourned, may I say that earlier this evening I had an argument with Senator Croll with regard to the universality and non-discrimination of private pension plans. I am informed by Senator Godfrey that in respect of money purchase plans, where an annuity has to be purchased, there is indeed a discrimination against women in the amount of the payment, in the purchase of the annuity itself. Therefore, I apologize to Senator Croll, and take it that I have lost the argument.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

> Third reading of the Bill S-6, intituled: "An Act to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act".—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.).

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Argue is not here this evening, and he has concluded his remarks with respect to the bill. If it is the view of honourable senators, I would move, seconded by Senator Petten, that the bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must seek your indulgence to detain the house briefly on this bill. I have had an opportunity of reading the minister's statement on closing the debate on second reading, and I must say that he leaves me up in the air on a few points. While he is not here tonight, I had better put my views on the record, and perhaps he will find an opportunity at some time to let me know what his reply might be.

One of the questions that I put to him during the debate was as to referring the bill, and matters connected with it, to the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee. I asked him whether that board had considered this policy.

I notice that in his speech he said that they had considered the policy. That really begs the question: What did they say, what did they decide? I leave that question for him to consider at his leisure.

I also asked about the review called for by section 5(3) of the Two-Price Wheat Act. This provides for an annual review by the minister. Again he said at the last sitting that they did review it, but my question really was: What did they say; what was the finding of the review? I would be obliged if that information could be given.

I also referred to the fact that a new set of parameters was announced recently by the minister with respect to the two-price system on bread wheat as being a floor of $5 per bushel and a ceiling of $7 per bushel for basis 1 CW 13.5 per cent protein wheat at Thunder Bay. That constitutes a distinct advance over what we had before, but it leaves open two matters. First, I notice that in connection with Durum wheat, on which the same system applied in the past, the new arrangements do not specify any ceiling. So, in effect, the possibility of subsidy by the farmers to the consumers in respect of Durum wheat is eliminated.

I should like to know what is the difference. Why did we eliminate it on Durum wheat and why did we retain the ceiling in connection with bread wheat? It would strike one as being reasonable to suppose that if it was a sound policy in connection with one kind of food, namely bread wheat, it was equally sound policy in connection with another kind of food, namely, Durum wheat. Perhaps too much Durum gets into the cake, and perhaps the minister has a rooted objection to cake as opposed to bread. But, in any case, I would like to know what is his rationale in that respect.

The most important point I have to make is the last one—the question as to the date on which this new policy comes into effect. I notice that it is August 1 next. When the matter was first raised in the house, the minister expressed great sympathy with the plight of the western farmer who had been subsidizing consumers to the tune of about $25 million up to this date, according to one set of figures which I believe is reasonably accurate.

I gathered from what he said that he would like to remedy this injustice. In fact, I suppose that is what his announcement is supposed to do. In that case, why did he wait until August 1. There was the new crop year, to be sure; but why not start on June 1, because otherwise we are going to have the farmers in a position of continuing the subsidy, which is worth from $5 million to $8 million a month, for an unnecessary two months. It could have been made effective on June 1 and not August 1.

I would very much like to know the reasoning for the 60 days' delay. It becomes particularly pertinent these days because I think we may all look forward to a less than average crop in many parts of western Canada this year. That I fear will certainly be the case in my own province of Manitoba.

So it seems to me that it would have been an act of justice, prudence, equity—however you want to say it—that if you recognize the undesirability of continuing this farm subsidy to the consumer, then the sooner you put an end to it the better. There was an opportunity to put an end to it on June 1 of this year and we find that it is going to be ignored and that the actual date will be August 1.

I hope the minister has a rationale for this action that may convince me, but I shall be rather surprised if he has. I certainly hope that in the course of our proceedings he will be able to justify the reason for this failure to rise to what I think is a reasonable opportunity to act in an equitable manner toward the wheat producers of the country.

I do not intend to oppose third reading, but I did wish to place those comments on the record.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADDRESS
HIS EXCELLENCY JOSE LOPEZ PORTILLO
President of Mexico to Both Houses of Parliament in the HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA on Monday, May 26, 1980

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Jean Marchand, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, Speaker of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Speaker of the House of Commons): Hon. members of the Senate and House of Commons are happy to welcome His Excellency Jose Lopez Portillo, President of Mexico.

[English]

Excellency, we are deeply moved by the honour you do us of addressing this joint meeting of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

I call upon the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada to introduce our distinguished guest.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Your Excellency, Mr. President of the Republic of Mexico, Mr. President of the Chamber of Deputies of Mexico, Mr. President of the Senate of Mexico, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons, distinguished members of the Parliament of Canada.

On behalf of the people of Canada and of their parliamentary representatives, I have the honour to extend a heartfelt welcome to you, Mr. President, to the Heads of the Mexican Chamber of Deputies and Senate, and to the Ministers and other high representatives of your Government who accompany you on this visit.

Since our meeting in Mexico City in January, 1976, Mr. President, I have been greatly impressed by your country's growing stature in the global community of nations, a growth which Mexico's many Canadian friends had both desired and predicted.

Canada welcomes your country's determination to use its stature to contribute effectively to the enhancement of global stability, which has been seriously disturbed in recent months.

In response to such dangerous threats to world order as the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, and the violation of the immunity of diplomatic persons and premises by Iran, Canada believes it is essential for other countries to give firm, practical and united expression to their opposition to such serious transgressions of international law.

[English]

Mexico and Canada agree that the goal of global peace with justice must be approached by other paths as well and especially by responding more effectively to the needs of the world's developing countries. I therefore look forward, Mr. President, to discussing with you the critical issue of greater co-operation between the groups of nations which have come to be known as the north and the south.

We acknowledge Mexico's earned status as one of the leaders of the Third World and as a country which has helped to focus attention on the urgency of international development. The wide ranging proposals which you yourself, Mr. President, put forward at the United Nations General Assembly last autumn were a particularly valuable contribution.

The problems of the least developed countries are especially compelling. There can be no real solution until the world community finds the will and the way to replace sterile rhetorical confrontation with a united and practical response to the poverty, hunger and stunted economies which oppress so many of the world's peoples. We look forward to working with the Government of Mexico to help find the will and the way.

Mr. President, we discussed this morning with our ministers ways in which our two countries might enrich our bilateral relations. It is true, of course, that our relations do go back hundreds of years. You may know that one of Canada's most illustrious explorers, Samuel de Champlain, visited Mexico City in 1599 when your capital was a thriving community of some 100,000 Spanish and aboriginal souls. He was so taken with the beauty of your country, sir, that he did not come to our country until a few years later as a sort of second choice.

Happily, in recent years there has been more frequent travel between our countries. It has resulted from a growing awareness of how we can meet many of each other's needs and a growing consciousness of how many things we have in common, not the least of which is a friendly neighbour with whom we share a border.

We also share similar aspirations for industrial and economic development. We have long enjoyed a mutually beneficial trading relationship, and Canada has been an important source of financing for Mexican development. I note that while Canadian imports from Mexico are still dominated by agricultural products, the pattern of trade has broadened to the point where Canada now purchases a more diverse range of products from Mexico than from any other Latin American country.

World conditions have now brought us to a moment of full potential for closer economic relations in the future. Canada looks to Mexico as a secure supply of oil for our eastern provinces. Mexico looks to Canada as a supplier of the industrial equipment and technology which you need in order to fulfil your goal of economic diversification.

There can be no doubt that your visit has produced considerable progress toward agreement which will help satisfy the needs of both countries.

[Translation]

Mexico and Canada share a rich and varied cultural heritage which took root far back in our history, at the time when the original people of North America were its only inhabitants. The later contributions of European civilization have resulted in a lively cultural sharing, of which both countries are justly proud.

Twelve years ago, Mexico and Canada began their formal cultural relations with an exchange of notes. There followed in 1973 an agreement on annual exchange visits by young specialists and technicians. More recently, in 1976, I had the great pleasure and honour of signing in Mexico City, with your predecessor, a cultural agreement covering a wide range of activities in the fields of information, fine arts, theatre and telecommunications.

Mr. President, your visit is the occasion of a new meeting between two countries, both of whom are eager to contribute to peace and international justice. I am confident that, together, Mexico and Canada can make a greater contribution to our hemisphere and to the world. For all these reasons, sir, we welcome you.

His Excellency Jose Lopez Portillo (President of Mexico): Your Excellency the Prime Minister of Canada, Honourable Members of Parliament, ladies and gentlemen.

I consider it an honour and an opportunity to be welcomed in this stately chamber that serves as a meeting place for the representatives of the noble Canadian people. The expressions of cordiality that you have shown me have augmented and reaffirmed both the official and private tokens of esteem I have received during my sojourn in this generous country. I wish, consequently, to express to you my own gratitude together with that of the Mexican people.

I am returning from a trip that has taken me away from this continent, and, as occurs in such cases, I am returning filled with reflections on geography and time. My first impression is that Canada, the same as Mexico, belongs to the New World not only geographically, but also spiritually. Despite the great distances existing on the American Continent, Canada is close to us and is inevitably linked to our own destiny.

Return to this continent leads us to the immediate and irrefutable reality that we are members of the great family that shares this continent, despite the fact that the most notable characteristic of this family and this territory is its diversity.

From this perspective, the problem of our relations should be posed as a necessity and not as something merely desirable; that is, as a geopolitical destiny more than an enumeration of affinities and specific coincidences.

Canada has gained new prestige, but it has not lost its former prestige. Despite its formidable industrial and urban growth, it continues to bring to mind an image of a nation of pioneers, an image it deserves in view of the concerted efforts expanded by this tenacious and hardworking people in every sphere.

The Mexican people are also persistent. They have been able to surmount rigorous historical tribulations and thereby strengthen their national identity. Their great historical battles are the culmination of a process of sovereignty and the initiation of new processes of sovereignty. The struggle for our independence was not won on a single occasion. It is a daily struggle that cannot be abandoned.

Canada and Mexico know the value and the price of independence, and they are open to any kind of exchange that does not imply dependence and subordination. We respect the rights of other nations and affirm here that the recognition of these rights is the basis of international order.

Consequently, although we, the three nations that constitute North America, should set down systematically revisable rules that will ensure improved co-existence and co-operation, we must not forget that the differences in the kind and extent of our development make it impossible under present-day circumstances to form a regional economic association of either a general nature or with specific reference to energy. Let us promote our bilateral relations, but let us not seek to establish artificial entities based on a single factor—the geographical factor, as important as it may be—but rather let us promote relations in which other equally important elements for the economic integration of several countries are presently lacking.

The focal point of the European Economic Community is support for the relatively homogeneous development of the nations composing it. This is not the case in North America.

As far as Mexico is concerned, we believe that the establishment of such an entity would inevitably impede our industrial development and perhaps oblige us to extract and export raw materials indefinitely for the use of the most developed societies. Even in the specific field of energy the exploitation of hydrocarbons has very different connotations in accordance with varying degrees of development. For us it will serve above all to create new sources of employment and to stimulate industry and agriculture. For an affluent society the high levels of consumption of hydrocarbons, which some deem to be excessive, serve to sustain a very high standard of living to which we cannot aspire at the present time. In such circumstances, I consider it difficult for us to arrive at a common strategy for the exploitation, future and use of energy unless they are included within a system of total responsibility on the part of mankind. This is what we have proposed to the United Nations.

The recent crisis convulsing the world is precisely the result of a lack of repesct for the independence of weak nations. Local conflicts and the permanent threat of global war are the result of a power mechanism bestirred by the craving for territories and markets.

For this reason, Mexico's efforts in favour of general and complete disarmament may be considered among mankind's noblest causes. The Treaty of Tlatelolco, for which Mexico is depositary, is a decisive step toward preserving a vast geographical area from nuclear destruction. This, however, is but barely a beginning, and it will only have full validity when it transcends the regional sphere and becomes a model for other similar treaties.

Universal acceptance of the rule of law—both domestically and in relations among nations—is the irreplaceable foundation of the social order. All societies, whether simple, complex, conservative or revolutionary, need law to preserve their unity and their coherence.

In any circumstances, but particularly in a time of crisis, it is absolutely essential for the international community to reaffirm the validity of its legal institutions. Defending the United Nations means defending the standards that govern peaceful coexistence among States and the supremacy of law over force.

We recognize, of course, that the United Nations' political and administrative machinery is not always effective in solving the world's problems. The scope and pace of its procedures are frequently not commensurate with the scope and pace required to solve such problems.

The political problems that have arisen in recent months call for the good offices of countries not directly involved in the conflicts. The concerted action of countries that have demonstrated their devotion to independence and for that reason enjoy international prestige may have, in certain cases, a profound impact on the solution of international conflicts.

Peace, however, is not merely the result of anti-war activities. The pacifism of the between-war period is a thing of the past. Now we know beyond the shadow of a doubt that peace is not possible without equitable development.

In order to achieve such development, we are committed to the establishment of a new international order, which is the only viable alternative to our decaying economic institutions. Inflation, unemployment, monetary chaos or the progressive indebtedness of the underdeveloped countries presage even worse evils, such as recession and famine.

The new international order in its political and economic aspects concerns—or should concern—all the nations of the world. To present it as a plan that derives exclusively from the developing countries is a grave and deliberate departure from the truth, unless, of course, we were to invent a happy world in which only consumers existed and in which neither raw materials, work nor the financing of trade were necessary. The critical elements that endanger peace are the developing countries that have to contend with social confrontations, economic crises and cravings for hegemony or spheres of influence. Everything here is related to everything else.

As part of this new international order, we have proposed the establishment of a world energy plan to the United Nations General Assembly in order to rationalize the production, distribution and consumption of energy. This plan anticipates using the resources derived from present energy sources to develop alternative energy sources.

This plan must include all the members of the international community. Therefore, each country—rich or poor, producer or consumer—must assume proportional responsibility to guarantee its implementation. At the present time the energy problem can only be resolved by the concerted action of the international community—not by the silent manipulation of dominant transnational interests.

The relations of mutual respect and friendship that exist between Canada and Mexico guarantee a proper framework for broadening our political, economic and cultural relations, and we have the will and the resources to bring this about.

In the economic sphere, we are especially interested in the possibility of making joint investments in certain specific projects.

We attach particular significance to political collaboration between our nations, since we are convinced that a common approach to certain international matters can help to strengthen the cause of peace and security both on this and other continents.

Your Excellency,
Honourable Members of Parliament:

We are embarking upon the next-to-last decade of the twentieth century under the shadow of grave international threats of war. The economic disorder of recent years is compounded by a generalized and acute crisis of confidence in all realms. This difficult state of affairs has even undermined the basic principles of peaceful coexistence among men and nations.

We have no desire to dissemble the wounds and scars of the world we live in. Rather, our aim is to transform it. We have little time left in which to do this, but we cannot renounce our commitment to forge the roads along which the new forces of life will march.

I pledge my faith in the future and in the fraternal relations between Canada and Mexico.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President Portillo, Mr. Prime Minister of Canada, Madam Speaker, honourable colleagues of the Senate and of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen, in 1973, we had the great honour to welcome in this House your predecessor, Mr. President, who came to convey to us the solemn testimony of the friendship uniting Mexico and Canada. Your presence among us today vouches for the constancy of this faithful friendship. Before acceding to your high functions at the head of the State, you had foreshadowed in your writings and teachings what has been your government's program for three years now. You summarized it in two short and strong phrases which call for the reinforcement of the structures of freedom and justice and the enrichment of the values which are fundamental to national coexistence. We are also of the opinion that in the life of every nation there must exist a dynamic relationship between the institutions with which a country endows itself and the values and aspirations they represent.

Mr. President, your visit takes place at a milestone of our history where that balance must be achieved anew. Please rest assured that Canadians will be up to that perpetual challenge as they have always been.

[English]

Mr. President, you called our attention to the urgency of searching also for the right equation in the international economic arena. We will ponder your views and the remarks by the Prime Minister about the growing and necessary interdependence between the economies of the world. Canadians have always been concerned about basic human needs. They are becoming more aware that the problem is complex, that there is no easy solution and that a wide range of interlocking issues will have to be tackled with patience and determination by all parties concerned.

We thank you, sir, for your visit and we hope that your talks with Canadian ministers will lead to a further strengthening of ties between our two countries to their mutual benefit.

[Translation]

Your Excellency, please accept our most heart-felt gratitude and offer our best wishes to your magnificent country.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, I have the honour of expressing, on behalf of each and everyone of my colleagues, the joy that we feel at hosting you here in the House of Commons of Canada.

[English]

We have listened to your speech with great interest because it reflects your feelings and those of your countrymen toward our people and our country.

You emphasized that Mexico had to bring about unity in order to establish a homogeneous community whose mission is to create the type of climate most likely to favour the prosperity and welfare of your citizens while respecting their differences.

[Translation]

That reminds us that we too, like yourself and your people, must abolish the gaps that would prevent Canadians from feeling united within this family which bears a great deal of resemblance to yours and within the larger family which occupies the entire North American continent.

Your words bring to light the need for this constant co-operation between peoples who defend the same values and who are trying to promote a heritage with common roots in civilization.

Mexico is a fascinating country which has a special appeal to people the world over. Its spectacular geography, composed of bodies of water, forests, plains and mountains, projects an image which encompasses the multiple facets of a country whose vibrations echo the life of the old and the new world. Your culture, your civilization, your architecture, your monuments, your folklore, your music and your literature form a blend of new wealth and old treasures. Your country still retains the secret of the language and thought of its first inhabitants, a language that has not yet been deciphered but which, through its multitude of signs and its variety of images, expresses the thought, the psychology, the joy, the pains and the hopes of a people who preceded us by far in America. It is never without deep emotion that we walk your land in the hopes of discovering old paths which will bring us back to the dawn of human life and wisdom. The meeting of the civilizations of old and of the new one which followed it have produced the jewel that is Mexico. It is with pleasure that I say to you how much we admire your political, cultural and social edifice which is greatly envied by all those who give priority to the fundamental values of society.

[English]

Mr. President, you have done us the honour of bringing with you a large delegation of most distinguished politicians and citizens. I would like to extend my most sincere greetings to these distinguished visitors and I wish to assure them not only of our interest, but also of our affection.

In closing, please allow me to express once again, on behalf of all members of the House of Commons, on my behalf, our heartfelt thanks. There are links between Canada and Mexico that we would like to reinforce and extend through more frequent meetings between the representatives of our respective Parliaments. I would ask you, Your Excellency, to take this message to your countrymen as well as our warmest wishes for their welfare and progress.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY—REPORTED CRITICISM BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am pleased to see Senator van Roggen in his place today. Perhaps he can now answer the question I put to him, through the Leader of the Government, last night. Senator van Roggen has no doubt read last night's Hansard by now, so I do not need to repeat the question. I would merely ask him to reply to it.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, at the outset let me say that I am sorry I was not in the Senate chamber last night when this question was posed. I was unavoidably detained on very important public business at the time and I was late arriving in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: No doubt.

Senator van Roggen: In reply to the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition, I can only say that the Foreign Affairs Committee, I am sure, would want to give serious consideration to inviting the Honourable Mark MacGuigan to appear before the committee.

As honourable senators are aware, the block system we have for committee meetings places certain strictures on the scheduling of committee meetings. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would not wish me to set aside the appearance on Tuesday next of the former leader of his party, Mr. Stanfield, to accommodate an appearance by Mr. MacGuigan, but certainly consideration can be given to calling a meeting for that purpose.

I might point out that Mr. MacGuigan will be appearing before the appropriate committee of the other place on Tuesday next relative to his departmental estimates, and while that appearance has nothing to do with his remarks of the other afternoon, no doubt he will be questioned very fully at that time. In the light of that hearing, the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee might well want to consider whether it too should have the minister appear before it.

Senator Flynn: I concur in the position taken by Senator van Roggen. Certainly, Mr. MacGuigan's appearance before the committee of the other place would provide him with good practice prior to his appearance before our committee. I do not doubt that the chairman would want to question Mr. MacGuigan about the propriety of discussing the foreign policy leanings of Mr. Ronald Reagan, the former Governor of California, in light of the possibility of his being elected President of the United States.

Senator van Roggen: I do not know whether that is a further question, but I certainly do not wish to disturb my digestion by speculating on all of the different prospective presidential candidates in the United States.

ENERGY

PRICE OF DOMESTIC OIL—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development and concerns the leisurely pace of negotiations between the federal government and the oil-producing provinces. Can the minister indicate when these negotiations will be resumed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, those negotiations, to my knowledge, will be resumed within a week or perhaps a little more, and I say that without accepting the description that they are going forward at a "leisurely pace."

The honourable senator will know, of course, that the present agreement expires on July 1, and therefore the federal government views with some urgency the matter of attempting to complete those negotiations with an agreement satisfactory to both sides before that date. It may be that there can be an agreement to take some more time, if that is necessary, but I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has demonstrated not "a leisurely pace" but rather an urgent pace. It may be that the producing provinces would like to have some more time to consider the proposals that have been put before them.

Senator Murray: By way of a supplementary: The minister did indicate on May 14 that if there were some substantive matters that could be reported relating to the discussions going on, he would try to report those in the Senate by June 1. I wonder, in view of his reference today to the proposals made by the federal government to the producing provinces, whether he would like to elaborate and enlighten us on their content.

Senator Olson: In response to that question, I think I could do no better than to repeat the position taken by my predecessor. I do not have the quotation right in front of me, but what it says essentially is that it might either frustrate or jeopardize negotiations that are going on. Therefore, until there is an agreement that both sides negotiating are prepared to make public their positions, it would not be in the interests of reaching conclusions quickly to give that. I know what I said to my honourable friend about the June deadline, and I can tell him now that the negotiators on both sides are not prepared to go public with the terms and conditions they have offered.

Senator Murray: One final supplementary: Can the minister explain the rationale for postponing the resumption of negotiations with the oil-producing provinces because of the constitutional talks beginning on June 9? What is the connection there? Is it beyond the capacity of the federal government to carry on two sets of negotiations dealing with two separate subjects at the same time?

Senator Olson: I don't think it is beyond the capacity of the federal government, but there is in some ways a relationship with respect to this. Of course, now that in the whole country a vast amount of goodwill, if that is the word, has been generated to make some positive movement on constitutional amendments that have been nearly agreed to—but not quite—for more than 12 years, it would be wise to avoid anything that might frustrate that. For example, the division of powers sometimes involves the making of exchanges as between one section of the Constitution and another. It seems to me that some of the matters that have been brought to a head because of the vote in Quebec ought to be completed, and completed soon.

DELAY IN DEVELOPMENT OF ALSANDS PROJECT—EFFECT ON ONTARIO

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. With less than a month to go before the existing oil-pricing agreement expires, time is also running out on any prospect that the Alsands project will commence development this year. I wonder if the minister will inquire—I realize he will have to take this question as notice—and in due course inform the Senate of the number of potential new jobs which Ontario will lose this year if the plant is delayed as a result of the failure of the federal government to reach an oil-pricing agreement with the producing provinces.

● (1410)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): What the honourable senator has done—and honourable senators on that side keep doing it—is to ruin his question by putting something into the preamble that I cannot agree with—in this case, for example, that it is the federal government's fault. In my opinion the federal government, at least since February 18, has demonstrated a greater urgency of reaching a conclusion on all of these matters, including an arrangement for oil sands and, indeed, a subsequent tar sands plant, than was demonstrated during the eight or nine months that my honourable friend's colleagues opposite were in charge of the negotiations.

Senator Flynn: And here we are nearly six months later.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: No, we are not; but, in conclusion I will say that I will take the question as notice.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

EAST BLOCK—OFFICE ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Leader of the Government. Last night I enlisted the support of my colleague Senator Williams to test the security of the East Block. We found it to be quite effective. It was manned by House of Commons staff.

If my assumption is correct that that building is still under the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works, then under what authority is the House of Commons staff providing security forces for that building?

Further to that, I understand all senators here received a memo this morning from the Honourable Don Johnston informing us that he now has new offices located in room 119 of the East Block.

Senator Flynn: Who said that?

Senator Lang: The Honourable Don Johnston in a memorandum dated June 2, which was on our desks this morning.

Senator Flynn: You are lucky. I did not receive that.

Senator Lang: Could the Leader of the Government advise us under what authority the Honourable Don Johnston has made that announcement?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I will take the question as notice. Let me assure honourable senators, however, that there will be Senate representation in the East Block when, ultimately, the new offices are brought into sufficient condition for occupancy.

Senator Flynn: Is the Leader of the Government implying that he did not receive that notice either?

Senator Perrault: Mr. Johnston did not apply to me for permission to send out the notice.

Senator Flynn: But did you receive a copy of the notice?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have not yet had an opportunity to look at the memorandum, but I do not think there should be undue concern on the part of honourable senators, many of whom I feel sure will be occupying space in the East Block.

ENERGY

PRICE OF DOMESTIC OIL—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In the hope of eliciting more information than is usual when I ask questions, I will try to be brief.

Senator Olson: Good!

Senator Donahoe: Will the minister tell us if it is a fact that, should the taxation system be de-indexed, the federal government will then receive the bulk of its additional $1.7 billion in revenues from lower-income Canadians?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: You try brevity, too.

Senator Olson: I sincerely appreciate the brevity of my honourable friend's question, but, of course, he has broken one of the other rules, and that is that ministers do not answer hypothetical questions.

Senator Asselin: What rules?

Senator Donahoe: Then let me move by way of a supplementary question from the hypothetical to the actual.

Given statements by various ministers that assistance to energy consumers in Atlantic Canada, assistance to energy development projects in western Canada, and the maintenance of the indexing provisions of the taxation system will likely only proceed if a generous agreement is reached with the energy producing provinces, will the minister be good enough to find out and report to us what other federal commitments are dependent upon the size of the federal take from the yet-to-be-negotiated energy price?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I take that question seriously, but I find it difficult, because I like to give accurate and precise answers to questions.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That is why you never reply.

Senator Olson: But the honourable senator knows very well that when announcements are made on the negotiated package with the producing provinces they will obviously be announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, because he is the minister responsible for carrying out those negotiations. I can give him the undertaking that I will bring that information to this chamber as quickly as possible from wherever he makes that announcement. Presumably it will be made in the House of Commons. I say again, as I have said so many times—I am getting tired of hearing myself say it—that I cannot make announcements for and on behalf of other ministers until they themselves are ready to make the announcement.

● (1415)

Senator Flynn: We tried to explain that to you last year, but without success. It seems that you now understand.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT TAXATION POLICIES

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The deputy minister stated, when he appeared before the Senate Committee on National Finance that the problem of the national deficit will not be solved by a decrease in public spending. On the other hand, two days later, the Governor of the Bank of Canada indicated that the government should reduce public spending. As those two distinguished gentlemen are doubtless advisers to the government on its fiscal policy, are the minister and his colleagues seriously concerned about those major differences of opinion?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Perhaps the honourable senator can positively identify that there is a serious difference of opinion; but this question was asked of the Prime Minister in the other place yesterday. There is a clear, precise, complete answer on page 1682 of Commons Hansard concerning the government's position. Possibly it is against the rules to quote from Hansard of the other side.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Olson: In response to the honourable senator's question, let me quote from what the Prime Minister said:

> —it seems to me that the result of an analysis made by the Deputy Minister of Finance would stand for itself. It seems to me to be a perfectly valid statement. We cannot cut expenses to the tune of some $14 billion. Therefore, if we want to reduce the deficit, at some point there will have to be an increase in taxes.

In different words that is exactly what I said in this chamber yesterday. There is then another long statement. I would recommend that my honourable friend should read it, because it is so clear.

Senator Flynn: It is clear to you.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is clear that you are going to raise taxes.

[Translation]

Senator Charbonneau: On a supplementary. The Prime Minister, as you say, indicated that taxes would have to go up in order to reduce the tremendous deficit—or to borrow the English word that was used—the horrendous deficit, which I believe is estimated at $14,165 million. As the oil price subsidies are responsible for the major part of that deficit, can the minister tell us whether steps are being contemplated to alleviate their impact.

[English]

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, there are many measures being contemplated to alleviate the situation, on both the income and expenditure side. However, I should caution my honourable friend that I will not go into details, because they are part of the negotiations now going on between the Government of Canada and the producing provinces.

Senator Charbonneau: Mention was made in the other place that there would be a general tax increase in order to narrow the deficit.

[Translation]

I have another question in French: does the minister consider it fair that the entire population, through the generally expected increase in taxes, should subsidize the consumers of oil products?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I suppose there is no such thing as a tax that is applied equally to everyone across the country. I think my honourable friend will recognize that this so-called justice, or what may be termed "fair," can be specifically applied to almost any tax. It depends on how much of the product you buy, if that is where the tax is levied, or, if it is income tax or corporate tax, those levels change, depending on what category you are in, and so on. I would not try to make the argument, therefore, that it is fair. What I do know is that the revenues from general taxes, and, indeed, from all specific taxes, are used for all expenditures. Whether or not there is a direct relationship between where you collect the tax and where you spend the revenue from tax is sometimes pretty hard to specify or articulate.

• (1420)

Senator Charbonneau: Honourable senators, what I am trying to say is that with regard to the user-pay policy, the tendency that seems to be emerging is that the additional revenues are going to be taken from the population at large, instead of the users of petroleum products, and I think that is manifestly unfair. I am not saying it has been done, but there certainly is a tendency in that direction. Everybody seems to be talking about it, from the Prime Minister down to deputy ministers and other ministers.

Is it the policy of the government that these subsidies, as you just said, will be financed through general taxes, or through the users of petroleum products?

Senator Olson: The most accurate answer I can give is that it may be one or the other or a combination of both.

Senator Flynn: So what else is new?

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SALE OF GRAIN TO THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

I understand there are rumours circulating in Winnipeg of a potential substantial wheat sale. Naturally, I would not seek any information if it were going to jeopardize such a sale, but I wonder if the minister can confirm what I have heard or give us some information?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to reply to the Honourable Senator Molgat that indeed the Canadian Wheat Board has just concluded a very substantial sale of wheat to the People's Republic of China, in the amount of 1.4 million tonnes. This is a very substantial sale, and one that—

Senator Flynn: Did you get notice of the question?

Senator Argue: No, I did not.

[Senator Charbonneau.]

Senator Flynn: For goodness' sake. What a coincidence.

Senator Argue: Well, you know, this is strange. Honourable senators opposite ask questions, and they are legitimate and excellent questions. If a question comes from this side they suspect it. There are intelligent senators on both sides of the house, and I would like to encourage my colleagues on this side, as well as my colleagues on the other side, to ask questions. If possible I would like them to give me notice, because sometimes I am a little slow in replying. In any event, please ask questions.

The Canadian Wheat Board has been successfully selling to the Chinese market for some years.

Senator Flynn: Look! He has a written answer.

Senator Argue: I am not reading from what I have in front of me. I am not reading.

Senator Flynn: Then why did you bring it into the house?

Senator Argue: These intrusions are not helping. This is an excellent sale, in an amount of 1.4 million tonnes.

Senator Olson: That is a lot of wheat.

Senator Argue: It is a continuation of a 3-year agreement for the amount of eight to ten million tons of wheat. This very large sale is to be delivered within the next six months. I am certain that the Wheat Board will be able to meet the target. My friends opposite can snicker, but I am proud that we are able to maintain our market in China. It is excellent for our grain producers because China is one of the biggest markets in the world, and it is continuing to look to Canada as a major supplier.

• (1425)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I would like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board whether he will take this house into his confidence and tell us about the terms of the sale, whether it is $5 a bushel or $8 a bushel?

Senator Argue: The Wheat Board, as a good business organization, does not always disclose the details of every single sale it makes. These sales will be at current prices; they will be at prices available to other nations of the world. The asking price today is some $5.40 a bushel for No. 1 CW Red Spring out of Thunder Bay. I am not going to ask the Wheat Board for that kind of detail, because on reflection I do not think the honourable senator would wish to have that kind of detail.

Senator Flynn: If you had been warned in advance, you could have given a definite answer. In any event, would you give our congratulations to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary question. The statement made by the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is an important one. But instead of making it the way he did, that is in answer to a question asked by a senator of his own party, I think that both in this house and in the other place, ministerial statements should be made as a rule on matters as important as the announcement just made by the minister, in order to allow the honourable senators of the opposition to comment on the policies implemented by the government.

Obviously, it should always be possible for the minister to make statements in favour of partisan policies, as he just did. Since this is an important policy statement of consequence for Canada, I think he should be fair to all members of this house, and particularly to the senators of the official opposition, and advise them in advance of the content of any ministerial statement, so as to enable us to give a better answer and either commend or criticize the government for its decisions.

[English]

Senator Argue: I don't know about the proposition that one should give advance notice of an announcement. I spent many years in the House of Commons—

Senator Asselin: That was a long time ago.

Senator Argue: —and I made many comments in reply to a minister who had made a statement. I cannot recall him ever having given notice. The member just had to stand up and do the best he could. In any event, I think the suggestion is a good one.

I am not an expert on the rules, but as I read our order of business, there is clearly not a place for statements on motions. If we all agree that at a given point in our proceedings there should be a place to stand up and say, "Honourable senators, I have a statement to make," and if honourable senators will accept that as being a proper procedure, I am prepared to do it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I don't think that procedure is now provided for in our rules, but if we agree that on some particular item one can stand up and make a statement, I would be prepared to go along with that.

Senator Asselin: Would you be prepared to give the opposition an advance copy of statements that you propose to make in this chamber?

Senator Argue: I would not commit myself to that proposition at this time.

Senator Asselin: As you know, this has been done in the other place for a long time.

Senator Argue: If this is a practice in the House of Commons, I would be glad to consider it. I doubt very much that it is a practice, but I would be prepared to check.

PAYMENT FOR PROTEIN-TESTING EQUIPMENT

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Will the minister confirm whether since August 1979 producers have been paying elevator companies for protein-testing equipment by way of deductions of 75 cents a tonne?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I will have to take that question as notice.

Senator Bielish: Would the minister also confirm that this special fund, set up for the elevator companies who maintain that this equipment is too expensive for them to buy, has amounted to $1.5 million?

• (1430)

Senator Argue: It has been suggested that if I make a statement in the house, notice might be given. Had I had notice of this question, which is rather detailed, I perhaps could have had an answer today, and it might be more satisfactory from the standpoint of newsworthiness—because it is important that the Senate be acknowledged—if the question and the answer could go on the record at the same time. I am happy to take it as notice and bring a reply to the honourable senator.

TRANSPORT

REPORT ON REVIEW OF WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT—EFFECT ON WESTERN GRAIN PRODUCERS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate for transmission to the Minister of Transport. Can he inform this house as to when the Minister of Transport will table in Parliament the report on the review of the Western Grain Stabilization Act and its effect on western grain producers?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It would be more appropriate for my colleague, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, to reply to that question.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Would you repeat the question?

Senator Nurgitz: The question was: When will the Minister of Transport be tabling in Parliament the report on the review of the Western Grain Stabilization Act and its effect on western grain producers?

Senator Argue: I shall be happy to look into that question, and, as the minister responsible for the Western Grain Stabilization Act, make a reply in the Senate to my honourable friend's question.

Senator Flynn: May I ask a supplementary for clarification purposes? Do you suggest that you will not consult the Minister of Transport?

Senator Argue: When I obtain the answer I will be pleased to send a copy to the honourable minister to whom the leader refers.

Senator Flynn: That is interesting.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

REPORTED DEFICIT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It has been reported that Canada experienced a $7 million merchandise trade deficit in April. That is not a large amount, but when one considers that there was a surplus of about $650 million the previous month, it is rather horrendous. Would the minister tell us if this appears to be a trend or is it an isolated instance, or perhaps the minister can give us some analysis of the reasons for this rather dramatic switchabout?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. It may be some temporary aberration. I am not sure.

TRANSPORT

DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHEASTERN BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL FIELDS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the position of the Government of British Columbia that it requires an answer by June 20 to its request of the federal government with respect to a transportation arrangement for the northeast coal block in British Columbia, will the federal government be ready to give an answer by that time or, indeed, does the federal government think that an answer will be required by that time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my colleague Senator Olson may wish to provide additional information on this point. However, it should be made clear that the proposal that the Canadian National Railways should become involved in the establishment of the infrastructure for the transport of northeast coal to Prince Rupert was raised only a relatively short time ago in Calgary with Mr. Phillips, the Minister of Economic Development and Small Business Development of the Province of British Columbia. Indeed, the original scenario called for the Canadian National Railways to be involved only in the upgrading of its main line from Prince George to Prince Rupert. The rail infrastructure was to be established by B.C. Rail.

That process would have required substantial upgrading of the CNR main line. It is estimated that the cost of upgrading that CNR main line would be in excess of $60 million. The proposed new role of the CNR, introduced on May 16 without any prior notification by the Province of British Columbia, called for a total involvement of the CNR to provide and to operate the rail infrastructure as well as to upgrade their own main line from Prince George to Prince Rupert. The original B.C. Rail estimate of $215 million to establish the rail infrastructure appears, at least from preliminary information, to be unrealistically low.

[Senator Flynn.]

I know that the honourable senator, and other members of this house, realize that planning for a project of this magnitude takes time. The costing of this scheme has to be done in the light of escalating construction costs, the cost of tunnels and many other costs. All of these must be estimated before any firm figures can be produced by the CNR.

The information made available to me indicates that CNR officials have worked overtime in an effort to assess the capital cost of the project so that they can quote a realistic transportation rate per ton for coal from this important northeast development in British Columbia. Those figures may be available some time this week. The Government of Canada did not establish any June 15 deadline; it was not established by the CNR; we presume it was established by the Government of British Columbia, or by the coal companies or by the Japanese negotiators on the other side.

Senator Austin: Can the government leader advise us whether the potential for sales of coal from the northeast coal block will in any way be jeopardized if an answer by the Government of Canada is not available by the date, which I believe is June 20?

Senator Perrault: The Government of Canada has been informed that the quality of metallurgical coal in the northeast section of British Columbia is such that potential purchasers in Japan are most anxious to gain access to that supply—initially five million tons a year. In view of the very tight time frame imposed on the Canadian National Railways, and in view of the professed need of the Japanese for this source of coal, perhaps the Japanese might consider some flexibility in the deadline. However, that is only a personal estimate of the situation.

WESTERN CANADA—DOUBLE-TRACKING OF RAIL SYSTEMS

Hon. C. William Doody: I should like to put a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government. In view of the tremendous amount of work and money involved in the rail lines that the honourable senator mentions, does he feel that this will slow down the projected double-tracking of all the rail system in the western provinces, as per the government's commitment prior to the election?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator seems to have a single-track mind about double-tracking. May I suggest to him that Dr. Bandeen, the President of the Canadian National Railways, in a most eloquent speech a few days ago, said the volume of traffic which is growing on the rail systems of Canada will very definitely require double-tracking to the west coast before the end of the century. The fact is that this far-sighted and far-seeing government took this ultimate need into account when certain statements were made during the election campaign a few weeks ago.

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. May I infer from that answer that the Prime Minister did not quite understand the length of the term of office he was applying for when he made the commitment?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the distinguished Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Gladstone, was Prime Minister a number of times before he retired.

But seriously, honourable senators, the proposal that was made during the course of the election campaign by Liberal spokesmen indicated a practical concern that over a period of time double-tracking would be required. The vision which has led this nation into so many successes was apparent again here.

Senator Olson: And it is already under way.

Senator Flynn: But not out west. He didn't fool anyone out there.

ENERGY

OIL EXPLORATION INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to respond to a question asked by Senator Balfour on May 28 concerning government policy on incentives for frontier oil and gas exploration. Honourable senators will recall this commitment in the Speech from the Throne, and I quote:

> My ministers believe that, if given the opportunity, Canadian companies and investors would involve themselves more heavily in the energy field. My government, therefore, adopts the specific goal of at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry by 1990, and will soon take the first steps to achieve this objective.

As far as special incentives for exploration are concerned, the federal government does, in fact, have under consideration various elements of an incentives program that would replace the super depletion tax provision. The program will be designed to encourage frontier development and to foster increased Canadian ownership of the oil industry. As to the nature of specific incentives in support of these objectives, I can say that they will give full recognition to the risks and costs of frontier development and to the need for continued activity in order to assess our resource potential and determine how quickly production may be achieved. The finalization of this incentive system must, of course, await the outcome of the oil price negotiations.

FISHERIES

ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question asked by Senator Doody during Question Period on May 7, concerning government programs to aid the fishing industry.

I want to assure the senator that the government is indeed sensitive to fishermen's problems. There are, and have been, a number of specific programs administered by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to assist our fishermen. In fact, the present minister of the department is popularly known as the "Minister for Fishermen."

An example of action to assist fishermen can be found in the other place today when members will be asked to give second reading to Bill C-28, the Fisheries Improvements Loan Act. This piece of legislation will provide loan guarantees to fishermen, and I might say, with substantial increases in the amounts available in keeping with their increased capital requirements. Honourable senators, of course, will soon be asked to give their consideration to this important bill.

In addition, the department sponsors a number of programs designed to help our fishermen. Among these programs are the Fishing Vessel Insurance Plan, the Salmonid Enhancement Program, and the Fish Quality Improvement Program, just to name a few.

ENERGY

OIL—CONSERVATION MEASURES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, on May 28 Senator Sherwood asked whether the minister would clarify what is being done to encourage the development of alternative energy sources, such as gasohol, methane, hydrogen, and wind, sea and solar power.

The reply is rather long, Mr. Speaker, so I would ask that it be taken as read. Along with that answer is a much longer document, and, if I may, I should like to table that document. If honourable senators are interested in it they can obtain a copy from the Table. It is too long to ask that it be printed in Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, I do not want to correct a cabinet minister on the procedure to be followed in this house, but unlike the custom in the other house, one here does not address the Speaker when he wants to make a statement or a speech. He says, "Honourable senators," not "Mr. Speaker."

Senator Olson: I accept that.

> On May 28 Senator Sherwood asked what action the federal government is taking to develop alternative energy sources in substitution for oil. He expressed particular interest in this respect in gasohol, methane, hydrogen, wind, sea and solar power. Although this is quite a broad question, I am pleased to respond at this time and will endeavour to indicate the main directions the government is taking in reducing the country's dependence on high-cost oil imports of uncertain supply.
> The federal government is encouraging the development of renewable sources of energy through a steadily increasing program of research and development. This work is led by the National Research Council and has been underway since 1974. The budget for this research, which is mainly contracted out, has grown from less than $1 million in 1974 to some $20 million in 1980. The main thrusts of the research are in solar heating and utilization of biomass as a source of energy, although important programs are conducted in wind energy, geothermal energy, and hydraulic energy.

The most promising renewable sources of energy for Canada are biomass and solar radiation. In addition to the research sponsored through the National Research Council, the federal government, through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and other agencies of the federal government, has sponsored programs to encourage the use of wood as a source of energy in the forestry industries. It has also supported the development of a Canadian manufacturing industry in solar heating, and the demonstration of promising technologies in renewable energy through federal-provincial agreements.

These latter programs were announced in 1978 by the Honourable Alastair Gillespie, then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. They have a budget of $380 million over a period of five years. These programs are now well under way, having begun during the past fiscal year. I should be happy to provide Senator Sherwood with documentation giving detailed information on any of these programs, should he require it. I can assure him, however, that very good progress is being made in providing substitutes for oil through research and developmental programs on all aspects of solar energy, and on the use of forest and agricultural resources as alternatives to oil.

Senator Olson then tabled:

Copies of document respecting alternative energy sources, being a reply to Senator Sherwood's question of May 28, 1980, issued by the Minister of State for Economic Development (English text).

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CUBAN REFUGEES—CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, questions have been asked recently by Senator Nurgitz and other senators about the Cuban refugee situation. Yesterday Senator Nurgitz asked the following question:

> It is my understanding that 32 of the 70 Cuban persons who have been able to get out of their country, and who have applied for and received permission to come to Canada, have indeed arrived today. Would the Leader of the Government please undertake to confirm for us that only 70 people out of the quota of 300 have in fact applied to come.

The precise figure as of today is not immediately available to me. I understand that the honourable senator's information may be approximately correct.

[Senator Olson.]

However, it may be useful to state that, although the Cuban asylees who have reached other countries appear to be interested in entry to the United States—because many of them, as you are aware, have relatives in the United States—and not Canada, we remain willing to interview Cubans who have reached third countries, in order to determine if they are interested in permanent settlement in Canada. It would appear premature to discuss any increase in the number of Cuban asylees at this time, but Canada remains interested in the question of Cuban immigrants on humanitarian grounds and we are willing to assist in seeking a solution to the problem.

To this end, Canada participated on May 8, 1980, in an international consultation in San José, Costa Rica, where ways of dealing with persons seeking to leave Cuba were discussed. We shall continue to follow this situation closely. The fact is that most of the Cuban refugees appear to be not interested in coming to Canada at this point. However, Canada has been very forthcoming in its attitude to those who wish to come here.

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN PEACE INITIATIVES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Macquarrie asked a question with respect to the difficult situation in the Middle East.

The government deplores the cycle of violence and counter-violence seen all too often in the Middle East, whether in the Israeli-occupied territories, in Lebanon or elsewhere. It condemns all such incidents, whatever their origin. It is our strong hope that the perpetrators of such attacks will be brought to justice.

The recent rise in tension, most notably on the West Bank, indicates the necessity for fresh efforts to achieve an early and successful conclusion of the present peace negotiations. This will, hopefully, remove the causes of mistrust and discord which lead to such tragedies.

Canada has been in the forefront of support for the Camp David peace process. While the government is disappointed that the May 26 target date for the completion of negotiations on Palestinian autonomy has passed, we continue to believe that process has the potential to be a viable and effective means of moving towards a comprehensive peace settlement. To achieve this difficult process, compromises must soon be made by the parties to the negotiations. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated to the press on May 31, Canada does not have a leading role in the resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute, but the government has discussed these issues with those directly concerned and has made its views known to them.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. William J. Petten, on behalf of Senator Hayden, moved the third reading of Bill S-2, to implement conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and the Republic of Liberia, Canada and the Republic of Austria, Canada and Italy, Canada and the Republic of Korea, Canada and the Socialist Republic of Romania and Canada and the Republic of Indonesia and agreements between Canada and Malaysia, Canada and Jamaica and Canada and Barbados and a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Bird for the second reading of Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I know we all listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation of Bill C-16 given by Senator Bird last evening. She certainly cleared up a number of points which had not been too well explained up to that point. It has to be acknowledged that there has been a great deal of misunderstanding on the part of those receiving the GIS as to exactly how much they will receive as a result of the passage of this bill. I expect most of us have had a great many questions asked of us about it. Some people believed that the basic Old Age Pension was to be increased by $35; others felt that it was only those who were living in institutions who would receive it; still others believed that only those who received the full supplement would receive the full $35; and there were yet others who felt that the $35 was to be paid to every recipient, resulting in those households made up of two old age pensioners receiving an additional $70 a month.

So certainly there has been a good deal of confusion about exactly what this bill will mean to old age pensioners. I feel that if the speech of the sponsor of the bill in the Senate were given some publicity and some distribution, it would go a long way towards clearing up the confusion in the minds of those receiving the GIS. As was made clear in Senator Bird's speech, all single persons receiving the supplement will receive an additional $35 a month, with married couples receiving the $35 between them, or $17.50 each.

The sponsor of the bill also gave a short but interesting review of the development of the Old Age Security Act in Canada. While we can take some pride in the fact that we have come a long way from the original $20 a month at 70 years of age, and that with a means test and a provision that it had to be paid back if any assets were left by the recipient after his or her death, we still have to admit that a great deal remains to be done. Senator Bird brought to our attention that a great many Canadians have an income below any acceptable poverty line. Some 1.3 million Canadians will be eligible to receive the GIS following the passage of this bill, and of those 740,000 are single people, with 60 per cent of those being women.

Honourable senators, these are shocking and startling statistics. We must wonder why it is that, despite the tremendous industrial development in Canada since the end of World War II, 1.3 million of our people are still living in poverty, and there are a great many more who, while not below the poverty line as such, are living in what we might term "genteel poverty."

Bill C-16 is a good bill as far as it goes. Not only does it increase the GIS, but it will also help some of those who are living in what I term genteel poverty. As there is an automatic increase in the amount of the annual income a person can have and still qualify for a portion of the GIS, an additional 45,000 people will be eligible for some supplementary benefits as a result of the passage of this bill.

At the present time, a single person with an income of less than $2,400 a year qualifies for the full supplement of $153.35 a month. At the other end of the scale, a single person with a yearly income of $3,695.99 is eligible to receive a monthly benefit of $35. Once Bill C-16 comes into effect, those with a yearly income of less than $4,632 will be eligible for some small benefit.

Honourable senators, during the course of the debate on this measure in the House of Commons considerable doubt was cast upon the merit of indexing the old age security pension to the consumer price index, the feeling being that the CPI was not really applicable to old age pensioners. Items which older people must have increase in price faster than do most of the items which make up the consumer price index. Consequently, any additional income received as a result of that indexing is not sufficient to compensate for the actual increase in their cost of living.

There is much interest at the present time in providing adequate pensions. I was pleased to hear that the Minister of National Health and Welfare hopes to have a national conference on pensions this year to focus national attention on the necessity of fundamental changes in the long term leading to necessary improvement in our whole system of private and public pensions. If such a conference can be arranged—and I trust it will be—I hope there will be a close examination by that conference of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies and that its chairman will be asked to participate and indeed be a member of any pension commission established.

In speaking on Bill C-16, the sponsor made mention of a personal experience she had with some elderly people who were living on a small income. An increase of $35 a month is not going to give those individuals much more, because I expect prices will rise once this bill comes into effect. As a short-term measure, I wonder whether there is not some way in which those persons, and persons like them, could have their living expenses reduced. As I see it, a person in that circumstance has to pay from $175 to $200 a month in rent, and that out of a total income of $340.15. I am not familiar with the programs for senior citizen housing in the larger centres, but I do know that there is a successful program in smaller communities, and in those communities senior citizen housing is in great demand. Where there is senior citizen housing available, the rent would probably be between $75 to $100 a month, and the apartments provided, I must say, are comfortable, convenient, and very satisfactory in every way. Senior citizen housing is fulfilling a real need, and it is doing so in a satisfactory manner. Certainly, it deserves every encouragement and support for expansion.

Honourable senators, a few questions were asked during the course of the debate last evening, and I too would like to have them answered. One question related to how the figure of $35 a month was decided upon rather than, say, $40 a month or $50 a month. Another related to the reaction of the provinces to this increase in the GIS of $35 a month as it affects provincial programs. It is not going to be of any benefit to the ordinary citizens, if an increase in the federal pension comes to $35 a month and some other benefit worth $35 a month is taken away from them by the provinces. It will be interesting to hear if the provinces have made any decision upon this matter.

Honourable senators, this bill concerns itself with one matter only and that is increasing the amount of the supplement to the old age security pension by $35 a month. This increase will be helpful at least for a time. However, since it does deal with that one matter, I do not see how it would be beneficial to send it to a committee for further study, unless, of course, some other senator wishes to have that done.

To conclude my few remarks I would like to give one short quotation from the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. I read from page 175 of the report:

> The Senate committee is firmly convinced that the time has now come for Canada to incorporate the right to an adequate standard of living for all Canadians into the Canadian Bill of Rights. It is also clear that an adequate standard of living in the Canadian context is dependent on the security provided by an adequate income. The acceptance by Canada of an adequate minimum income as a matter of right for all citizens is the principal recommendation of this report.

Honourable senators, those words are as true today as they were when they were written back in 1971. The war on poverty continues. We have made great strides, but we have not won the war. But legislation such as this, small as it is, is helpful in winning the battle, and consequently I am pleased to support it.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I wonder if the honourable senator would permit me to pose a question. I was not able to be present during the eloquent presentation by Senator Bird but I was listening intently this afternoon to Senator Macdonald, who is a distinguished war veteran, as are many who sit in this chamber. I believe the question was raised in the other place yesterday, and I am wondering if he could elaborate on it, since I am not quite clear on the matter and it was not elaborated on very clearly yesterday. I am referring to the siutation of someone who is in receipt of a war veterans allowance. When this legislation comes into effect, will the Department of Veterans Affairs reduce the war veterans allowance by the amount that beneficiaries will receive under this new policy?

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would not presume to speak for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, although I must say that as a MacDonald from P.E.I. he is doing okay. Generally speaking it has been the practice that where a veteran is in receipt of a war veterans allowance, which is known as the "burnt-out" pension, and he receives some other income, that pension is reduced. Now whether that will hold true in this case or not, I do not know.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I should simply like to add a few words. I am always for the improvement of the condition of senior citizens and therefore I have no objection to the principle of this bill and to its beneficial effects.

However, having listened to the sponsor of the bill, to Senator Croll and also to the remarks of Senator Marshall and some other honourable senators, it finally seems to me that this bill is simply the result of an improvised electoral campaign promise. Senator Macdonald asked why $35?

Why $35? Because it was a figure which sounded just right in the electoral background in late December when an election program was improvised. So it is the least that could be done to pay an election debt. This is an improvement, as stated by several of the participants in the debate. It is really not a step forward in the right direction but it is better than nothing.

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might answer the question asked by Honourable Senator Muir. When a veteran on war veterans allowances reaches the age of 65 he naturally cannot collect two pensions. But there is an exemption in the act. When a war veteran reaches 65, if he is single there is an exemption of $15 a month; if he is married there is an exemption of $30 a month. This he would get in addition to his war veterans allowance. I understand that in the intervention in the House of Commons yesterday the Minister of Veterans Affairs assured the member who asked the question that war veterans would not be affected by the increase of $35 a month.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Bird speaks now, other than to answer a question, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, I want to begin by thanking Senator Macdonald for his very gracious comments about my speech last night, and also to congratulate him on his strong and constructive remarks.

I have here the answers to the very pertinent questions alluded to by Senator Macdonald and which were asked last night. They are rather lengthy, but because they are so important I hope you will bear with me.

Last night Senator Buckwold raised the issue of the extent to which we can count on the provinces to ensure that the GIS increase of $35 will be passed on directly to the pensioners. Senator Buckwold asked what steps had been taken to urge provincial co-operation in this regard. I mentioned last night that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had written to her provincial counterparts to enlist their support in passing on the $35 increase. I have a copy of her letter here, and I have summarized its contents, but I would ask permission that it be tabled. If that should be agreed to, honourable senators, then I shall continue and summarize it in my remarks.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(See today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

Senator Bird: Honourable senators will see that the terms of the letter are very specific. The minister asked the provinces to ensure that pensioners who receive what is called provincial "top-up" payments receive the full benefit from the federal increase. At the same time she has urged that this principle apply as far as possible in relation to the so-called comforts allowance available to pensioners residing in institutions.

Senator Flynn: What is the date of the letter?

Senator Bird: April 10, 1980. In addition to the letter which the minister sent to her provincial colleagues she encouraged active support on this issue by members of the House of Commons during the second reading debate. At that time she stressed the need for a common approach throughout Canada and in every political party, hoping that the provinces would respond favourably in the face of federal solidarity on this issue. She urged members from all parties representing all provinces in Canada to question any lack of provincial co-operation. To what extent can we count now on co-operation? Well, in this regard there is a precedent—when the $20 increase in the GIS was implemented in January, 1979.

First of all it should be noted that the largest number of persons affected by the passing-on issue are those who receive a provincial "top-up" payment. Of the six provinces which provide "top-up" payments to low-income pensioners, all six passed on the $20 increase in full. We have no reason to believe that the same will not be true of the $35 increase.

So we are really confident that the majority of low-income pensioners will directly benefit from this federal measure. The six provinces are Nova Scotia, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. As I said last night, we have already heard from Nova Scotia and British Columbia. We have heard from sea to sea.

Low-income pensioners who reside in institutions and whose care is subsidized by the provinces receive what is called a comforts allowance which is meant to be spent on personal or recreational items. There is a question concerning the extent to which the $35 increase will be reflected in the amount of these allowances.

It should be noted that provincial practices vary widely in terms of the amount and escalation of these allowances. With the $20 increase in 1979 it would be fair to say that the experience across the country was variable. While two provinces agreed that the increase would be fully passed on through the comforts allowance, residents in other provinces received partial increases or no increase at all. Sometimes these matters are quite complicated, because municipalities handle them.

Last evening I said that the minister had received word from British Columbia and Nova Scotia. While there has yet been no official word from the other provinces, that is not to say that their co-operation will not be forthcoming. Indeed, when the $20 increase was made it took some time for some of the provinces to make their position known. It often takes more than a month. In the light of the feeling of the country, I think we can be confident that most people will receive this increase.

Senator Thompson also asked an important question, which was raised again by Senator Macdonald. He wanted to know the rationale for deciding on the amount of $35. As I said last night, this was the government's judgment of the maximum that could be afforded at this time, given budgetary restraints. The total provision in the first full fiscal year of 1981-82 will be over one-half a billion dollars. That is a great deal of money. So you must realize what our problem is, and I think it should be shared by both sides of the house.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to what Senator Croll was saying last night. This bill is, of course, a short-term assistance measure. Senator Croll, who I think is a great Canadian and who has made such a tremendous and enlightened contribution both to this house and to our country, is quite right in talking about the long term. That is why I mentioned the conference and why we hope that the conference will go well. But they are two different things we are talking about, and yet, of course, we are both in complete agreement.

Honourable senators, I hope that the $35 a month will be in the hands of these poor pensioners by the 1st of July. If so, it will make a tremendous difference to them. I am in agreement with Senator Macdonald that we need not send the bill to committee. I hope that you, honourable senators, will also agree.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I do not know if I am allowed to make my remarks now. I understand that up to now Senator Bird was answering questions that had been put rather than making her speech which is supposed to conclude the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I believe that unless there is an objection, the honourable senator may make a remark.

Senator Tremblay: When Senator Bird took the floor it was obvious that she was answering questions put previously, and I did not realize too well at what time she was answering questions, which authorized anyone to put other questions, and when she made her final remarks. I ask that question to know what is my position concerning those questions.

The Hon. the Speaker: If honourable senators have no objection you may do so. Otherwise, I shall have to consider that this is the final speech of Senator Bird.

Senator Tremblay: The last part of the speech concludes the debate, but if I may, I wish to put a few questions on a point that I consider very important.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do honourable senators agree?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tremblay: The point I wish to raise is precisely the same that was raised several times and left some questions unanswered, to say the least, the involvement of provinces in those changes to the existing program, as we wonder if all provinces are going to maintain their additional allowances when the federal pension is going to be increased by $35. If my memory serves me well, a question was put yesterday concerning exchanges between the federal minister and her provincial counterparts. We are informed today that a letter was sent on April 10 by the federal minister to her provincial counterparts. I do not have the information here but as I recall the bill was tabled on April 18 in the House of Commons. Keeping those two dates in mind, the question I have is as follows: Was that letter sent by the federal minister to place the provinces before a fait accompli or to start the discussions, the negotiations that might harmonize the new federal initiative and the existing programs? I believe it is a very important question considering the many precedents which have interfered with the action of the two government levels in certain fields or which put them in potentially conflicting situations. When the provinces are confronted with firm decisions, which have a bearing on specific aspects of some of their own programs, how can we expect to have what I would call a federalism of agreement, of harmony, if the two levels of government are comparable to each other? The provinces have often been placed before a fait accompli by the federal government and so found themselves in a sort of impasse. The purpose of the federal legislation having what I would call popular appeal, the provinces, when they intervened in any way to change things, were forced to go against popular opinion, because of the demagogic appeal of the legislation, or else to throw in the sponge and give up the negotiations needed to ensure that programs or proposals harmonized. My question therefore is this: Did the letter of the federal minister place the provinces before a firm decision, to which they would have to adjust, or did it initiate negotiations? That is the first part of my question. If it launched negotiations, with a view to harmonizing the programs, what were the results of those negotiations?

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Bird: I trust you will forgive me for answering in English, but the question was rather long.

● (1520)

[English]

I believe the minister notified in advance what she proposed to do, and she was, of course, living up to the government's promises made during the election—and we do live up to our promises made during elections—and asked for the same co-operation that the federal government had received on previous occasions.

In the past this does not seem to have been a matter for lengthy negotiations, because obviously the provinces have behaved well and with the same compassion as that shown by the federal government.

Senator Flynn: Did you say "Behaved well"?

Senator Bird: I hope they were behaving well. I believe they were behaving very well, because they did exactly what the—

Senator Flynn: They are behaving well when they do exactly as the federal government would have them do.

Senator Bird: I do not object to their behaving well. No, I do not see why they would not. I do not object to their behaving well. I feel that the honourable senator's concern is really unnecessary. Of course, I had the same concern. That is why I went into the matter at such great length. However, I believe it is more important to get this measure to the people than to go on negotiating in order to achieve something that is going to take place anyway. I hope that answers the honourable senator's question adequately.

Senator Tremblay: I should like to add that I am concerned about the federation. Every time that we have measures like this which concern people, we are speaking from the point of view of the provinces. The provinces are always put in a position where they have to accept the measure, although it is not a federation approach; it has not been discussed so that both governments can act together in a concerted way. One government places the other in a sort of dilemma, either to defend what I would call the federation approach or une approche populaire.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, this is a situation on which there has not been argument or dissatisfaction by the provinces or the federal government. Therefore we are perhaps putting a red herring across a very good trail.

Senator Flynn: No way!

Senator Bird: On the other hand, since we shall soon be holding constitutional conferences, perhaps the honourable senator would wait and see what can be recommended.

Senator Flynn: The "red herring" may be a Liberal herring.

Senator Bird: That, of course, is beyond my knowledge.

Senator Tremblay: Yesterday when answering questions the honourable senator said that only two provinces had joined in the program.

Senator Lamontagne: It is not a shared program.

Senator Tremblay: It is not a shared program, but it is——a program in which both levels of government are implicated. The program is so "knit", if I may use the word, that the action of one has a bearing on that of the other. The question that was put yesterday was this: Will the provinces simply cancel their own supplementary benefits since this new increase fits into the overall scheme?

That is precisely the type of impasse which works against what I would call healthy Canadian federalism. It is not contrary to the letter of the law, its legal or literal aspect. But it does rub against the grain of Canadian federalism. I feel it is very important not to always stick to the letter of the law. The future of a country does not always depend on a literal application of the texts of law. It is essentially a matter of healthy relations, of congenial relations, and I think we have here a case of little regard having been paid to maintaining such communications and relations as would lead to positive harmony. Finally, I should be surprised if things did not turn out that way in the coming days or weeks. It might result once more in popular action, who knows, perhaps electoral in its origins—

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Tremblay: —and create discord in the climate and attitudes that are deeply involved in the style and the health of our federal system.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Bird moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CONSTITUTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thurdsay, May 29, the debate on the motion of Senator Lamontagne to authorize the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to consider and report upon certain constitutional provisions.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the other night I expressed some concern about the wording of the motion, but I have not had the official reaction of the mover. I do not know whether he wants to express, once again, his objections to what I said, or whether he would have me continue my remarks, leaving it to me to answer his questions at the end of the debate. But, if he would rather explain his position further, I am quite willing to yield to him.

Senator Lamontagne: As you wish.

Senator Flynn: In other words, you have nothing to add to support your proposal as stated.

Senator Lamontagne: I do have a statement to make but I did not make it, obviously, when I moved the motion. But in the remarks I intend to make, I do not want to cover this aspect only but also another part of the motion under study. I am therefore prepared to speak immediately. If Senator Flynn wants to proceed right away, obviously it is his right.

Senator Flynn: No, that is not my problem. As I said the other night, my problem is that I would not object to the proposal if it were amended to allow consideration of all problems related to the constitutional revision. If Senator Lamontagne says, "No, I stand by the motion as submitted, " then I will explain my point of view and propose an amendment. But if the senator is ready to accept amendments, there is no need for me to speak at this time. If he says he accepts nothing—

Senator Lamontagne: You might convince me!

• (1530)

Senator Flynn: Maybe. One never knows. I would be greatly surprised, in all sincerity, for until now, after so many years of working in the Senate with Senator Lamontagne, I have come to believe that he has never changed his mind after proposing something to the Senate, regardless of any attempts to make him listen to reason. At least it has been very rare and I cannot remember an incident where he changed his mind.

Senator Lamontagne: That is completely false. Moreover, Senator Tremblay can testify that I even acceded to his request to amend my motion.

Senator Flynn: That is another matter. I am speaking of times when the text was before the house; you never changed your mind then. That you may have tried in this case with Senator Tremblay, I know, and I commend you for that. But, that is the minimum you have ever done. You have just conceded ever so slightly in the hope that in doing so it would suffice.

Senator Lamontagne: I did exactly as I was asked.

Senator Tremblay: Is that a question of privilege?

Senator Flynn: You may rise; this is certainly a question of privilege.

Senator Tremblay: Very well, I am consulting my leader to find out what the proceedure should be. Having been directly involved by what Senator Lamontagne has just said, I would simply like to inform honourable senators that when Senator Lamontagne first gave me—and this, I greatly appreciated—his first draft resolution, there was mention of only one matter: the future of the Senate.

Personally, having an overall approach to the matter, I pointed out to him that I was under the impression, as a member of this august place, I would feel very uneasy about talking only about ourselves, in our way of approaching the constitutional issue. So I made the suggestion—and here you will allow me to quote textually as we are old friends—and I said "at least add something that has to do with the contents"—

Senator Asselin: This is a motion to save face.

Senator Tremblay: —and then I think I had raised the issue. That is where he introduced his second material for thought—the issue of rights. Is there another one? No, there are only two.

But, as far as I was concerned, it was a matter of saving face, as someone just said, and not appearing in the common perception as being concerned only with our own future but also as thinking about the future of the country.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the imbroglio between Senator Lamontagne and Senator Tremblay having been cleared up, I come back to the motion that is before us. As I pointed out the other day, what the motion proposes is to refer to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs two subject matters, the first one being individual and collective rights and I suppose their entrenchment in the Constitution, although that is not said specifically. The second is the eventual role of the Senate, or a Senate, because the text is a little obscure on that. I would point out that we have been studying the role of the Senate for a long time. We examined it in the Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on Bill C-60 and there was a report on that.

Then there was the Senate Special Committee on the Constitution which made observations. There was also a Special Senate Committee, if I remember well, on the Senate.

So, as Senator Tremblay pointed out earlier, it seems to me in the circumstances and particularly with all the things that have happened since the tabling of Bill C-60, especially the referendum in Quebec, it seems to me the central problem is certainly not the Senate. As far as I am concerned, if to keep the country united, we had to abolish the Senate, I would be the first one to vote for that solution.

Senator Lamontagne: I would like here to rise on a question of privilege. I believe Senator Flynn is reducing quite considerably the scope of the motion because I see a third aspect to it that I intend to explain in my remarks and which is to try and find an alternative to the Senate, to have the provinces control certain extraordinary powers of the federal government. It was mentioned a bit earlier, namely when would those powers be exercised in provincial jurisdictions. It is a third aspect which I think is more important than the other two.

Senator Asselin: Just say so in your motion.

Senator Flynn: Yes, of course, that can always be because of the text that is rather vague—provisions that could deal with the role of an eventual Senate. I quite agree it is not limited to the present Senate; it is not a defence. That is why I suggested to Senator Lamontagne that he elaborate on his proposal before I spoke. It does not matter. My first objection is that, regardless of whether it is a matter of saving the Senate as it is, or slightly changed, or replaced by another formula about which Senator Lamontagne could tell us, the problem now is not there.

As far as Quebec is concerned, and I believe that no one will disagree, the basic problem of constitutional reform concerns the division of powers and jurisdiction. I believe that there would not be a serious constitutional crisis in Canada at the present time if Quebec did not consider that the Constitution must be reviewed so as to meet certain aspirations expressed by successive provincial governments in the last 35 or 40 years. What is important is the issue of jurisdiction.

I do not want to take a position at this time as to whether the present division of jurisdiction is right or not. What I am saying is that the main problem with which we must deal is the division of powers. You simply have to consider the present debate; as long as we have not settled that problem, the matter of the Senate, the matter of the Supreme Court, the matter of institutions, all that will have no importance and nothing will be solved. The major defect of Bill C-60 was that it did nothing about the major controversy, that is the division of jurisdiction. Indeed, very few people are overly concerned about the matter of the Senate, even though I believe that, in principle, this question is very important and that something must be done about it. However, the type of institution that we need as a second legislative, consultative or collective house must depend on the matter of jurisdiction and the way that this jurisdiction will be used.

We had an example of this earlier in the intervention of Senator Tremblay, which should give us food for thought. There is not only the fact that the Constitution must state that such and such a thing comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces or the federal government. There is also the manner in which each level of government uses its jurisdiction. Perhaps the major defects or the major problems that we now face result from the fact that the central government has used its jurisdiction sometimes clearly, sometimes vaguely and sometimes obscurely. This is the problem with which we must deal. I do not see why we should tell a committee of the Senate not to deal with the major problem, the problem of the division of powers, and to deal only with two problems, that of collective and individual rights and that of the future of the Senate, about which other committees have already made recommendations. The Joint Committee and the Special Committee of the Senate have already given their opinion on these matters. We would be telling the committee not to deal with the real problem to be solved.

For this reason, I believe that the committee must be able to discuss the division of powers and I therefore suggest that the motion be amended in this way:

That the second, third, fourth and fifth lines of the first paragraph of Senator Lamontagne's motion be stricken and replaced with the following:

"be authorized to consider and report upon the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights."

● (1540)

[English]

The wording in English would be as follows:

That the second, third, fourth and fifth lines of the first paragraph of Senator Lamontagne's motion be stricken and replaced with the following:

be authorized to consider and report upon the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights.

Honourable senators, may I add that this would in no way preclude, for example, that the committee appoint a subcommittee that would take the work of the special Senate committee on the Constitution, and give us an updated report on the work accomplished by that committee on that particular subject.

The idea is that in my view we must deal with the main issue without neglecting the others, but that we must take a stand before the Canadian public as addressing ourselves to really important rather than minor issues, because in my view the question of the Senate is a minor issue. Once the division of powers is settled, we will then be in a position to see what type of institution should crown the whole.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I shall first put the motion before the house, and Senator Lamontagne can then comment on it.

The main motion reads as follows:

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider and report upon constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and upon the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

That the membership of the Committee be increased to thirty members and that Rule 67(1)(j) be suspended in relation to membership of the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it; and

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the second, third, fourth and fifth lines of the first paragraph of Senator Lamontagne's motion be stricken and replaced with the following:

be authorized to consider and report upon the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights.

[English]

If honourable senators wish, I shall read the amendment in English.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: The English version of the motion in amendment is as follows:

That the second, third, fourth and fifth lines of the first paragraph of Senator Lamontagne's motion be stricken and replaced with the following:

be authorized to consider and report upon the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, if it is the intention to deal with this rather important amendment today, perhaps we should have a copy in our hands so that we may study it.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to note one technical matter: The second line of the amendment begins with the word, "Affairs," and is not repeated in the motion that Senator Flynn read out. I think he has omitted one word.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps you will have a problem with the English version. I accept the correction to the English version concerning the word "Affairs."

[Translation]

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, if I understand correctly the procedure which will be followed, should my motion be approved, the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would form a subcommittee to carry out its mandate described in the motion.

Senator Flynn: No. I said the committee might form subcommittees but there is no mention of subcommittees in the motion.

Senator Lamontagne: No, I am not talking about your proposal but rather about the proposal in general. I am saying that if I understand correctly the procedure which would be followed, should my motion be approved by the Senate—

Senator Flynn: We are on the amendment.

Senator Lamontagne: Well I can speak not only to the amendment but also to the motion.

Senator Flynn: To the amendment.

Senator Robichaud: He can speak to his motion.

Senator Lamontagne: I can at least say a few words.

Senator Langlois: When speaking on the amendment, you may speak on the motion.

Senator Lamontagne: Let me make my point at least; I can say what I want to say to get to the amendment. Therefore I am saying that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would form a subcommittee to carry out its mandate described in the motion. The subcommittee, once it would have completed its work, would give its findings to the committee, which would report to the Senate through its chairman, Honourable Senator Goldenberg.

This procedure seems totally acceptable in view of the restricted nature of the mandate, and now I am speaking of the amendment. This mandate in the motion is viewed as a preliminary step to be followed by a more extensive study of Canadian federalism. This mandate is restricted to matters on which we have received the advice of a great number of experts and which have been the subject of many discussions by many parliamentary committees. We therefore only have to reconsider the documents already in existence and, especially, to reach precise conclusions in the light of current circumstances.

I therefore see this subcommittee or this procedure which could be followed not as an ordinary agency, not as an ordinary committee supposed to study and discuss matters by way of public meetings, but over and above all as a small study group which is to prepare a report as soon as possible. This sub-committee or this working group should not in my view hold public meetings and to help it in its work, it should avail itself of the research services already in existence. The small nature of this group would not exclude active participation on the part of other senators who could give their views by speaking or writing to the subcommittee. With respect to this participation, I hope, moreover, that the Senate will soon be able to organize a general debate on constitutional reform and renewed federalism.

Furthermore, I am not convinced that the proposed procedure I have just described for this preliminary step would be the right one should the Senate decide to make a more detailed study of other aspects of Canadian federalism which have not been so deeply studied until now. In this case, and this is where I agree with the opinion of Senator Tremblay as he expressed it a few days ago, it would seem preferable to create a special committee which could devote all its time to this task which would obviously be longer and more complex. This is one of the reasons why I am opposed to extend the mandate included in my motion and to ask, at this time anyway, the Committee of Legal and Constitutional Affairs to undertake a general study of all aspects of renewed federalism.

Those, then, are the reasons why I am opposed to the amendment, but I obviously reserve the right to discuss the main motion once we have determined the future or the relevancy of this amendment.

• (1550)

[English]

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, may I speak briefly to the amendment? I am appalled by the nature of this amendment, which is almost infantile in its conception. The words referred to deal with the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments.

Honourable senators, the Rowell-Sirois Commission spent some eight years dealing with that problem, and now the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that that same problem should be given to a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It is absolutely ludicrous.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order. I did not say a subcommittee. I said to the committee.

Senator Lang: Well, even to the committee.

Senator Flynn: If you want to say the committee is unable to do that, that is fine with me.

Senator Lang: The main motion deals with a subcommittee.

Senator Flynn: It does not.

Senator Lang: As I understand your amendment, you are trying to impose on a subcommittee—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Smith (Colchester): What subcommittee?

Senator Flynn: I never mentioned a subcommittee. Can't you read?

Senator Lang: I hope you have a little more knowledge than I assume from what you are saying about the way affairs are run in this chamber as far as committees are concerned. The motion is Senator Lamontagne's motion and relates to his speech here on May 13.

Senator Flynn: He never mentioned a subcommittee.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Where do you find subcommittee?

Senator Lang: In his speech of May 13.

Senator Flynn: You are completely lost. There was no mention in the motion or in the amendment about a subcommittee.

Senator Lang: I don't think it matters, honourable senators, whether it is a subcommittee or a whole committee.

Senator Flynn: Well, if it doesn't matter, what are you talking about?

Senator Lang: What I am saying is that this is a very serious matter of all-encompassing concern in Canada today and has been treated with political frivolity by the opposition, and I resent it.

I know exactly what Senator Lamontagne is trying to do in his main motion, and that is to confine our inquiry to the areas where we may be able to bring some degree of expertise into the discussion. That is all. We are not trying to change the future of Canada. We are trying to produce a vehicle that can give advice to those who have the power in the final analysis to make revisions to our Constitution, and to give them expert advice in areas wherein we have some expertise.

Now, once that thing is enlarged to include the division of powers between the provinces and the federal government, we are opening the whole thing into an area that would encompass something that the Rowell-Sirois Commission was involved in for over eight years. I do not think that is the purpose of the main motion, and I think the amendment to the motion is not an amendment but in effect defeats the main motion. That is my submission.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, if anybody wants to begin to engage in name calling around here, I enter the list because while I do not ordinarily engage in name calling I can do so just as vigorously, just as loudly and just as foolishly as the honourable senator who has just indulged in it.

I think if he wants, as I am sure he does—and I give him credit without reservation for being deeply concerned with this matter and wanting to find a proper and reasonable solution—if he wants this matter to be considered calmly and quietly, then I think he has set his foot on the wrong path entirely. All he has succeeded in doing, in my humble opinion, is to be so provocative that it is difficult to remain courteous in dealing with his personal assault upon the Leader of the Opposition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I know the honourable gentleman very well, and I don't think he meant to have that effect at all, but just in case he did I think it is necessary to point that out to him.

Really it is a little careless of someone engaging in debate to accuse another person of not being able to read when he's not able to read himself; when he inserts from his imagination the word "subcommittee" in a motion which is clearly written out before us and contains no such word, and then has the extraordinary disregard for print to say, "Well, it doesn't matter anyway." I suppose one can say that, aside from its provocative value or the opposite, what he said doesn't matter anyway. So he may have correctly described his intervention.

The scales having been relatively equally balanced in noise, perhaps I might be permitted to say a word or two on the merits, which I think we could usefully consider for a few moments. Here I realize that I am perhaps trespassing on the ground of my colleague Senator Tremblay, and I offer him my apologies for so doing, and say that I will not do very much of it. I hope I do not in any way interfere with what he intended to say.

It seems clear to me that we could—I won't use a careless word—deal all we want to with the subject matter of the motion and we would not be contributing very much towards the solution of the overall problem. Surely, judging from what we have heard for years, judging from what I have heard first-hand from the representatives of every province in Canada over a long period of years, judging from what I have heard in this house, and judging from what I have heard in the considerations and deliberations of the joint committee on Bill C-60, nearly two years ago now, the central issue is: Who has the power to do what, and with what attitude do the provinces on the one hand and the federal government on the other approach the exercise of those powers.

While it may occupy our time and stimulate our intellectual abilities, to the extent we have them, I think all this will do is lead us to concern ourselves very deeply with the other matters. The powers and how they are exercised surely burn deep into the mind and heart of every Canadian who has given very much attention to this problem; they are the things that really matter, the things that have to be settled. When those things are settled, it seems to me that the other things, although they may still be the subject of considerable debate, will fall into place, not naturally perhaps, but in a way that is consistent with what has been decided upon the division and the use of powers.

In order that I may not trespass any more on what my colleague intended to say, I will leave the matter there. I just emphasize that it seems to me that, having gone through the exercise for a number of months—I have forgotten now how many—in the joint committee two years ago in considering Bill C-60, I think we would all be employing our time to much greater advantage in considering the essence of the problem, which is the division and the use of powers.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I find it very difficult to agree in this debate with a former colleague, and a former provincial premier, who once again has been very eloquent, but one question bothers me, that is that we should only be concerned with good judgment at the present time in view of the circumstances. Of course, I do not question the honourable senator's judgment in general, but only in the present circumstances.

[English]

I must say, as a former provincial premier, following in this debate another former provincial premier, I noted another former provincial premier, Senator Manning from Alberta, and how very serious he was while listening to this debate this afternoon. I was also watching another former provincial premier, Senator Roblin from Manitoba.

In my estimation, the proposed amendment to Senator Lamontagne's motion is an effort to take away the role of the provincial premiers on the matter of powers—le partage des compétences. I don't like the Leader of the Opposition laughing at this.

Senator Flynn: I am not laughing at this. I am laughing at you.

Senator Robichaud: This is wholly a matter of provincial competence to discuss with the federal authority the division of powers. They will start discussing it on June 9, and they will continue to discuss it. It has been discussed for years, and it is very difficult to come to a conclusion, as we all know. It is not by name calling or saying, "This area wants too much vis-à-vis the other" that we are going to resolve the situation. I believe that the Senate is competent to do a variety of things, but it is not at the moment competent to solve problems that are under the jurisdiction of provincial governments and of the federal authority. Both sides are making efforts to solve that problem.

We have a problem at the moment, and it is the one that is obvious in Senator Lamontagne's motion. For us to have a comprehensive discussion of the division of powers between federal and provincial governments—and I say this in all sincerity—is to me almost nonsensical. As I said earlier, we would be assuming the role of the provincial and federal authority combined, and it would take us years to come to a solution. Why not let them find a solution to that problem? It is their role. We here have another role, which we discharge in our committees. The committee proposed by Senator Lamontagne can play a role, not only for survival.

[Translation]

In addition, I am sorry to have to disagree partly with my good friend, Senator Tremblay, when he said a while ago that perhaps if we concern ourselves only with the survival of the Senate, it is that we concern ourselves only with our own future. I do not believe this to be the case. The future of everyone here is the future of all Canadians because we protect regional interests throughout Canada, despite the fact that some may turn away at the present time, as I am aware, and in fact, as suggested by Senator Lamontagne, the committee should perpetuate the institution of the Senate, perhaps with minor amendments, but nothing major, as was suggested by some, and we should try to guarantee that the problem of power sharing in Canada will be solved. I hope that you will forgive me if this appears to be a partisan speech because I did not want to make one, but this is a dream which resembles that described by the former Minister of Finance on December 13 of last year.

● (1610)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I suppose it is trite to say that I really did not expect to take part in this debate this afternoon, but I have been so encouraged by what I have heard from my honourable friend opposite who has just spoken, and by what I have heard from the honourable senator who sits at the end of this row, that I felt I really must say a word or two.

I recall that on previous occasions the Leader of the Government took considerable interest in presenting to this chamber the idea that we should have a resolution before us to discuss the Constitution. I do not know whether all senators recall that fact, but on several occasions the Leader of the Government wound up some of his answers on questions having to do with natural resources and other matters by suggesting to us that we should initiate a debate on the Constitution and the reforms to the Constitution which are being mooted in the country today.

I thought that was a reasonable proposal, and it came as somewhat of a disappointment to see that the gentleman who had apparently been put up to give effect to that thought on the part of the Leader of the Government, the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, brought forward a resolution which I really have to say is quite inadequate in terms of the problem we face and in terms of the challenge given to us by the Leader of the Government. It is quite inadequate in my view, because while I see that mention is made of individual and collective rights—and I do not underestimate that aspect of our discussion—I see that it seems to zero in on the Senate.

It is, of course, a rather bizarre state of affairs when the future of Canada and the reform of its Constitution crystalizes into what happens in the Senate. We have been told, for goodness knows how long, what an unessential fifth wheel this body is in our Canadian constitutional and institutional arrangements. Perhaps it is more important than some of the critics have been inclined to say. Nevertheless, for us as senators in our first effort in this Parliament to deal with constitutional reform, to place the interest of the Senate, and how we may structure our own future, at the head of the agenda, may strike some as being a little inappropriate. I, for one, must say that I would have some embarrassment in explaining why we have limited ourselves in that way, if someone took the trouble to consult me about it.

I appreciate that that is not the motive of the mover of the resolution. I want to stress that. I understand what he is driving at, yet I must say that it will be widely interpreted as being a little on the self-serving side. In these circumstances, and in these days, that would be unfortunate.

The argument presented by two of the speakers who have taken part in this debate is that the division of powers is none of our business. This is a body that is supposed to protect regional interests, to have the responsibility for reconciling federal and provincial interests, to speak for regions and provinces. This was the special role given to the Senate by the Fathers of Confederation, and anyone who reads the record will see beyond peradventure of a doubt that that was the reason this body was formed. So I find it astonishing that we should now be told that for us to meddle in this question of division of powers is certainly not only beyond our scope of duty but, indeed, beyond our competence. I, for one, find that a hard argument to swallow, because the question of the division of powers is one of the great issues that is before us.

I will not disguise the fact that in my view the institutions of the federal government are important as well, but it is beyond question of a doubt that the great question that will be broached by the provinces when they meet is that of the division of powers.

To suggest that we, part of the Parliament of Canada, should be content to submit the issue to ten men who have no electoral mandate—though, indeed, they have a constitutional responsibility—without any effort or feeling on our part that we have a responsibility to discharge in connection with it, beggars the imagination. I find that impossible, and it seems to me that if we really wish to set our foot upon the road of constitutional reform in this country we must not only look to federal-provincial conferences of first ministers, we must look beyond that, because there are other political interests and other democratic interests that must be considered in connection with our Constitution, and I suggest that this body is one of them. I suggest that the House of Commons is one of them. I suggest that the members of House of Commons and the Senate, together as the Parliament of Canada, have something they ought to be saying and thinking about in connection with this central issue of our political affairs in these days.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: To take the view that it is outside of our authority or legitimate interest, and that we should leave it in the hands in which it appears to have fallen—temporarily I trust—is to me an abrogation of our responsibilities.

Now, what about our competence? Have we any competence to deal with it? We have the responsibility. We have the right. There is no question in my mind about that. Have we got the competence? Well, that is a matter of judgment. I don't know whether we have the competence that would attract the confidence of all Canadians, but it seems to me that if we conducted ourselves in a judicious manner, if we approached the matter with no preconceived notions, if we put behind ourselves whatever political affiliations or prejudices we might have, it is not beyond the bounds of imagination to suppose that we could develop some idea and some plan or policy that might be useful. Not that we should assume in this unelected body—this is an unelected body, unfortunately—that we have the right to tell other members of the Confederation—or indeed the other part of our Parliament—what they should do. I do not claim that right at all, but I suggest that we may have a duty to submit our best advice.

When I look around this chamber I see men of some political experience, not only in the legislative life of our nation but men who have political experience in the broader sense of that term in dealing with the general public interest. I see men who have experience, men who have some authority, men who have a background of knowledge that is not easily equaled in a body of a similar size. I suggest to you that if we do not have the full confidence of our nation—because I don't think we can claim that for the Senate—we have sufficient public legitimacy to render it within the realm of our duty, of our responsibility, of our right and of our capacity and competence, to deal with wider measures than those submitted to us in the original resolution that stands before us.

I say to members of this house that we would do ourselves a service if we were to broaden our outlook on this matter. I don't think it need be a matter of debate. I think that upon reflection members will recognize that the resolution has merit and that the amendment has merit, and that if we marry the two together, as we would in the normal parliamentary process, we may have a plan of action that would be of use to the country and reflect some credit on this house.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN AND EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTS

SEVENTH INTERPARLIAMENTARY MEETING OF DELEGATIONS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to the Seventh Inter-Parliamentary Meeting of Delegations from the Canadian and European Parliaments held at Ottawa, Ontario, from 25th to 30th November, 1979.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Lapointe.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, the substantial report of the seventh meeting of delegations from the Canadian and European Parliaments given in Hansard of May 5, as well as the very appropriate comments of the distinguished co-chairman of the Canadian delegation, the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, really require no additional comment except perhaps a few brief recommendations concerning future meetings.

First of all, I would like to see more active delegates from Canada, including a list of appropriate substitutes who would be present as much as possible at the briefings, who would be entrusted with a particular subject and who would remain ready to act as replacements in the inevitable absence of one or more official participants. For instance, last time we were counting on the presence of the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, who was certainly a very able representative, but unfortunately, he did not come. As I recall, two other members of Parliament were also absent.

[English]

It is unrealistic to have 33 persons travel from Europe to Ottawa for only four working sessions, especially when one considers that these sessions invariably start at least one-half hour late and are interrupted by lengthy coffee breaks. Either a day should be added to the programs or the number of items on the agenda reduced. The first day is usually filled with interesting statements from the various ministers, as well as visits to such places as the Library and the office of the European Economic Community here in Ottawa. But on the last day of these meetings there is always a feeling of frustration on both sides arising from the fact that some points cannot be covered or that a discussion has to be cut short to allow delegates to meet departure times.

The printing of the report as an appendix to our Hansard is a good precedent. On this occasion, an election prevented the co-chairman from acting more expeditiously in commending the report to the Senate, but normally the sooner this is done the better.

I feel confident that, apart from the friendships which they create, these exchanges are necessary in helping us appreciate the arduous task of the negotiators in matters as intricate as fishing rights and the numerous and complex activities of the Joint Co-operation Committee established four years ago by Canada and the European Economic Community under the framework agreement for commercial and economic co-operation.

[Translation]

Several honourable senators will recall the role played by the Senate, and especially the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in developing close relations between the Canadian and European Parliaments. This followed its substantial report on the relations between Canada and the European communities published in 1973. It would be a good thing for the new members of the Senate to acquaint themselves with this report since it was entirely to the credit of the committee.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other honourable senator rises to speak to the inquiry, or wishes to adjourn the debate, I declare the inquiry to be debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 5, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Hon. Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THIRTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, tomorrow, June 6, marks the thirty-sixth anniversary of D-Day, a day when thousands of young Canadians fell and died on the beaches of Normandy to protect our country and allied countries against the evil will of an enemy determined to destroy freedom throughout the world.

Significantly, some 113 years after Confederation, Canadian first ministers will gather in Ottawa in a few days to decide for 23 million Canadians, many of whose close ones died fighting to preserve that freedom, the direction our country will follow in order to preserve our union.

It is also most significant that two of those Canadian premiers, who served their country with honour and distinction in World War II, and experienced the dangers and horrors of the potential destruction of peaceful existence by an enemy from afar, will be contributing in no small way to offset the threat of a potential breakup of our country from within.

Premier Angus MacLean, who experienced the horror of escape and evasion of the enemy, and Premier René Lévesque, who distinguished himself as a war correspondent in the thick of battle, know full well the importance of comradeship with their fellow man in time of war; and I am sure they did not wonder about the cultural and racial differences of their comrades, but served and fought side by side as Canadians.

Perhaps, then, honourable senators, we can suggest that those two elder statesmen will take time to reflect on how we achieved the freedom we enjoy today, a freedom gained through the suffering of Canadians long gone, and that they will direct their experience and compassion to their comrades as they determine the future well-being of our great country, to ensure that those of their comrades who fell on D-Day did not die in vain.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that all honourable senators would wish to join in support of the eloquent and moving statement made by Senator Marshall. Those of us who are associated in any way with the ex-service community in this country know that lingering personal effects of the Second World War and other past conflicts are still felt in thousands of homes from coast to coast. Certainly, those who serve in Parliament are aware of the depth of sacrifice made by those who have fought for this country and others who have been members of Canadian peacekeeping forces. We know that their time of service and the price they paid did not end when the last shots were fired. Some ex-service people are still paying the price. They and their sacrifices should be kept in mind by all of us engaged in the legislative process, for some are experiencing real economic difficulties as they attempt to survive in today's economy.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 10, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

● (1410)

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I would like to inform the Senate that it is expected that three bills will be passed in the other place before we return on Tuesday evening. The bills are: Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act; Bill C-21, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers, and Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Next week will be another busy week and we hope that we can proceed with second reading of these bills on Wednesday.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It has been reported that the Treasury Board has ratified the agreement between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the government. Is the minister in a position to give us details of that settlement at this time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his inquiry. Indeed, I do have a statement to make on that subject. A commitment was made in that direction a few days ago. The statement is as follows:

The new contract, signed with the 23,000-member Canadian Union of Postal Workers, provides a base for future labour stability and a successful transition of the Post Office into a crown corporation.

The contract is the first signed with CUPW without a national postal strike since 1974, and the settlement addresses many of the basic issues that have proved stumbling blocks to peaceful settlement in the past as it contains an important recognition by the union of a requirement for improved productivity in the Post Office.

It also recognizes the inside postal workers' work in an industrial environment which is quite different from most other groups in the public service.

The basic provisions of the contract include the following: an 8.1 per cent increase in basic wages, a revised cost-of-living allowance formula, and improvements in shift and weekend premiums, overtime rates, and boot and glove allowance, adjustments in the hours of part-time employees, and the inclusion of a half-hour paid meal break as part of the normal 40-hour work week, but subject to—

And this is important, honourable senators.

—maintenance of output levels without a requirement for additional personnel.

The latter change, regarding the meal break, does not follow the recommendation made by Mr. Germain Jutras in his conciliation report. His recommendation, to increase the paid hours of work to 42½ hours per week from 40, would have cost the government and the taxpayers $25 million. Instead, the parties have agreed to achieve 40 hours of production within a 37½-hour work week at no increased cost.

The contract also includes a simplified grievance procedure and establishes a special arbitration panel to deal speedily with a backlog of grievances.

The wage settlement, together with the adoption of the same cost of living allowance provision for both the Letter Carriers' Union and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, reflects the changes made in the recent LCUC settlement.

After existing cost-of-living payments are incorporated into the hourly rate, the majority of inside postal workers will be paid between $8.80 an hour maximum for a mail handler and $8.95 an hour maximum for a postal clerk, both with two years' experience.

The revised cost-of-living formula comes into force if the consumer price index increase exceeds 6 per cent of the December 1979 figure and is the same as negotiated with the letter carriers.

The overall wage and benefits package represents a 10.4 per cent increase in expenditures over the life of the contract. Provisions restricting the use of part-time employees to peak periods and increasing overtime rates after two hours, are not expected to add substantially to the cost of the settlement.

"The paid meal period is in exchange for "maintaining the workforce output of the 40-hour work week" and the government fully expects employees will live up to their contractual obligation and work with management to achieve this."

It is the government's firm intention that both this new provision and all other elements of the new collective agreement will be implemented within existing Post Office person-year and financial resources, and it was only on this basis that Treasury Board approved the settlement.

In a letter sent to CUPW President, Jean-Claude Parrot, when the agreement was signed, Mr. Ouellet made it clear that if the productivity objective is not met, the paid lunch period will not be considered as an acquired right.

"The government will be watching postal productivity very closely, and if increases are not achieved it will not agree to renewing the paid lunch period."

• (1415)

"This settlement recognizes the intolerably high costs of continuing and prolonged postal disruptions to the public, to business, to the economy and the industrial relations climate in Canada."

"If the solutions negotiated in good faith by all parties provide a sound basis for labour stability in the Post Office and a smooth transition to a crown corporation, the Canadian public will be well served."

Honourable senators, I know it is a long statement, but the matter is of such importance that I felt the statement should be read in its entirety.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister for the statement. I wonder if it would be possible to get a copy. It is very complicated. I must say, in all modesty, that I had some difficulty taking in all the details of it.

Senator Perrault: I can well understand that. It is complicated. Since I have read it into the record, it will, of course, form part of the record of today's proceedings. If the honourable senator would like a copy this afternoon I would be very pleased to send it to his office as quickly as possible.

Senator Doody: I thank the leader. As was mentioned a few days ago, members of the government might consider distributing copies of such statements prior to the Question Period so that a reasonable response might be made. I know it is done in some forums, but it may not be appropriate here. Obviously it is a matter that is in the hands of the government.

On that settlement, I have been given to understand that there are some 4,000-plus supervisory personnel who had reached understanding on an agreement or the basis of a tentative agreement with management in the Post Office operation, and have now hauled back from that and have said they will not settle for less than the people they are supervising are to receive, which is really not unreasonable, I suppose.

The question is this: How is the government to monitor the 40 hours' work to be done in 37½ hours? That concept is in itself a little difficult to understand. How is it to be monitored if the supervisory personnel are not given at least equal treatment and perhaps superior treatment to that meted out to the clerical staff?

Senator Perrault: Those are two perfectly valid questions, but I must take them as notice. The exact monitoring procedure is not known to me. That information will be sought.

Senator Doody: Further on the same line, honourable senators, perhaps the honourable leader could make some further inquiries. I shall try to be brief. I understand there are certain rules and regulations governing the preambles to questions but since I have not been given a copy of them I shall have to ask the government ministers to bear with me.

I understand that this agreement by which 40 hours' work is to be done in a 37½-hour week is applicable to the postal workers, or at least to that unit covered by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Will the same circumstances and conditions be applied to other people employed by the public service directly, or by crown agencies, or is this to be specifically related to the Post Office and to no other area of government?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question arises as a result of a television broadcast last evening in which the person being interviewed was no less a person than Mr. Maurice Dupras, the Quebec Liberal Caucus chairman. Mr. Dupras, in his response to questions, said that he and his colleagues—representing a substantial portion of the total Liberal caucus, I may point out, because there are 74 members whom he may class as his colleagues from the province of Quebec—favour a Canada-wide referendum on constitutional reform, and they also favour unilateral patriation of the Constitution if the first ministers are unable to reach agreement.

When asked how much time he would allow the ministers to reach that agreement, he said only that he saw no reason to wait if an agreement were not to be reached.

My question is: Would the Leader of the Government please tell us how long the federal government intends to allow the constitutional talks to go on with the first ministers before proceeding to conduct a national referendum?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): First of all, honourable senators, it should be stated that Mr. Dupras was speaking for himself. As all Canadians have, he has a perfect right to express his views with respect to the constitutional changes under discussion. Similarly, I know that Senator Donahoe, with his background, has strongly held views with respect to the way in which constitutional changes should be effected. Mr. Dupras was not speaking on behalf of the government, but was speaking for himself.

Secondly, no rigid time limit has been placed on the length of these discussions, to my knowledge. I think there is some feeling of regret in certain quarters that the Leader of the Official Opposition has not chosen to join with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party in attempting to achieve a united front, at least initially, with respect to certain aspects of the process of constitutional change. That is an option that the Leader of the Conservative Party certainly has a right to choose. There is no real criticism of that position.

As I said, no precise time limits have been set. However, the Prime Minister has indicated that he believes there is some urgency with respect to this matter. Certainly, no one welcomes the prospect of another five to ten years of deadlock where no progress is achieved.

No decisions have been taken with respect to the holding of a national referendum. Again, I emphasize that Mr. Dupras was speaking for himself.

Senator Choquette: He has funny thoughts, hasn't he?

Senator Donahoe: As I understand the reply, the Leader of the Government is saying that the views expressed by Mr. Dupras are not the official views of the Liberal Party.

At the conclusion of his remarks, the Leader of the Government referred to the question of a referendum. My supplementary question was directed to that point, so for the sake of greater clarity I will put the question again.

I am interested in knowing if the Leader of the Government is prepared to inquire whether current Liberal thinking on this matter of a national referendum involves the possible re-introduction of the referendum bill that was before the 30th Parliament. If it does, would he inquire on our behalf whether there would be a need for a simple national majority vote or a majority in each province and territory?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that the government holds out real hope for the outcome of the Monday meeting of first ministers. At this point we are optimistic about the outcome of that and subsequent meetings. We do not believe that this is a time to prepare fall-back positions for the government in anticipation of failure. We do not anticipate failure.

There is a growing realization in all provinces that certain changes must be made, such as changes in the area of division of powers as well as certain constitutional changes. The subject of patriation has been discussed for many years. I must say that the meetings the Honourable Jean Chrétien had with the provincial first ministers in recent weeks give cause for a good deal of optimism about the future of constitutional talks.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—MAIL DELIVERY GUARANTEES

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I want to address a question to the Leader of the Government about the Post Office. For some time now the postal services in this country have been terribly criticized because of the inordinate time it takes for deliveries to be made between such major cities as Ottawa-Montreal, Ottawa-Toronto, Ottawa-Vancouver. There is an extraordinary lack of service in this regard.

We have just heard about the benefits of the new contract with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Would the leader be good enough to inquire of the Postmaster General as to what promises can now be made respecting delivery guarantees? We had a guarantee of some delivery a year or two ago which fell absolutely flat. The situation is worse today than I think most of us can remember. Could the government leader provide us with the overall plan, with some promise of fulfilment whereby we might expect 48-hour delivery or 72-hour delivery, or some basis of delivery that would bring the postal service back into public favour?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Molson raises a question that I am sure is in the minds of many Canadians across this country, including members of this chamber. I shall take his question up with the Postmaster General, but let me repeat the final paragraph of the statement I read earlier:

> If the solutions, negotiated in good faith by all parties provide a sound basis for labour stability in the Post Office and a smooth transition to a crown corporation, the Canadian public will be well served.

So the contract that has been achieved is a prelude to what the government hopes will be a transition to a more efficient and effective postal service under a crown corporation—a postal service that will provide the quality of delivery and service which all of us would like to see come about.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister will recall that last week at about this time we had a rather extended exchange about the drought in western Canada. At that time the minister said he hoped to be able to announce a federal government policy in respect of that drought soon. I remember asking whether it would be available on Monday. Well, it was not available Monday, and I ask whether it is available now.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the answer is that it is not available now. Consideration in respect of that policy is at a very advanced stage and will result, I think, in a program that will cover the main areas that Senator Roblin has in mind. I hope it can be announced next week.

FORESTRY

FIRE DAMAGE—ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Can the minister tell us whether any cost-sharing compensation program in respect of forest fire damage is being considered by the cabinet?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I cannot reply positively that specific assistance is being considered for forest firefighting and control. I would have to look into that. I do know, however, that some branches of the federal government, including the Department of National Defence, have already responded to some requests for assistance. To be more precise than that, I would have to make further inquiries.

Senator Roblin: I agree with the minister that the Department of National Defence has been exceedingly helpful in connection with forest firefighting in western Canada and elsewhere, and I am glad to put that expression of opinion on the record. If I may continue my inquiries on this point, I would ask my honourable friend about other aspects of cost-sharing compensation with respect to forest fire damage and whether an initiative is being taken to help provinces with clean-up operations and reforestation. I would also like to know if there are any specific projects planned to assist those whose job opportunities have been lost as a result of these forest fires.

I might as well tell my honourable friend that I am inspired to make these inquiries because of a statement made by his colleague the minister of—what is it now?—it has something to do with employment; in any event, the minister from Manitoba.

Senator Olson: The Minister of Employment and Immigration, and he is doing a good job.

• (1430)

Senator Roblin: I am glad my honourable friend thinks so.

Senator Perrault: He is doing a very good job.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to hear that the leader thinks so too. The minister has made three interesting suggestions with respect to the forest fire problem in Manitoba. Although I appreciate that my friend may not be able to answer right now, I would be interested to know what the present situation is.

Senator Olson: I anticipated fire control to be a post-fire matter rather than one which dealt with fires while they were raging. This is why I was so cautious in making my reply the last time. There are probably some matters under consideration, but I don't know whether they have reached a sufficiently advanced stage to go before cabinet.

Senator Roblin: I have to agree with my honourable friend that he is a cautious man. He demonstrates that every day when he answers questions in this house. However, I will not pursue that point further.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Can he tell us when the government's statement will be made in respect of the drought situation in Western Canada? At this time last week he said it would be made this week. May we expect it tomorrow or is it to be further delayed?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I think it will be next week.

Senator Roblin: Therefore, we may look forward to having a reply by around the third week of June.

Senator Perrault: It will be worth waiting for.

Senator Roblin: I am content to wait if it is worth waiting for, but judging from the performance I have seen so far in respect to these matters, I maintain considerable skepticism as to whether it will be worth waiting for. However, I will put that thought aside and give my friend the benefit of the doubt.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—FISHING VESSEL SUBSIDY PROGRAM

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Considerable confusion exists in the Atlantic provinces concerning the present status of the program providing for boat subsidies for fishermen. Applications being made in the Atlantic provinces are no longer being approved. Can the leader tell us if the program is being continued and, if so, under what form?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this issue has been discussed with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who is doing such a superb job not only for Atlantic Canada but for all of Canada. He informs me that funds will be available for the program this year. That is good news, and I know that Senator Phillips will wish to convey that information quickly to his province in the maritimes.

Details of the funding are not yet available, but I assure honourable senators that as soon as I have this information I will pass it on, certainly to Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: The present program provides that if construction of a boat begins before approval of the subsidy, no subsidy will be provided. Can the leader assure us that the construction of inshore boats can begin and the subsidy will be retroactive?

I am rather dubious about the effectiveness of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to whom the leader referred, and for that reason I would like the assurance of the leader that the subsidy will be retroactive.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information will be sought. Indeed, I hope to discuss the situation with my colleague and hopefully a reply can be obtained soon. I know that this matter is very important to many fishermen in the honourable senator's area.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN AMBASSADOR FOR DISARMAMENT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: I should like to direct a question of the Leader of the Government. My question is prompted by yesterday's report of the Learned Society's discussion on disarmament, which was a very serious gathering featuring such renowned Canadians as Dr. Epstein, George Ignatieff and Geoffrey Pearson. At that seminar the very strong suggestion was made, especially by Mr. Epstein, that Canada should be fighting like hell for disarmament because of our particular position in reference to nuclear arms, and that very important avenue for activity for a new ambassador would be useful and timely.

In light of the credibility of these people and the seriousness of the situation, would the leader tell us what progress is being made in designating someone as Canada's ambassador for disarmament?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators are aware that it is the intention of the government to be very active in this area. This, of course, was indicated in the Speech from the Throne. The main elements of the question, however, must be taken as notice. I do not have a progress report of our action in that regard immediately available.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE OIL EXPLORATION—NEGOTIATIONS WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I was reading recently that a representative of the Government of Newfoundland made a statement somewhere in this great country of ours to the effect that the Government of Newfoundland was willing to put a moratorium of up to ten years—the inference was for a longer period if necessary—on the offshore oil development or exploitation in the eastern area if some agreement could not be reached with the Government of Canada.

Are the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland currently carrying on talks? Is there an impasse at this level, or has it been decided definitely to go to court? I ask this question in view of the very serious situation with regard to the energy supply, particularly oil supplies in Canada, and the problem of security of supply. If talks could be arranged to find a peaceful political settlement it would be preferable to another long delay in development.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, wherever they live, should be most enthusiastic about the fact that the development of potentially rich new resources is proceeding in Newfoundland. It is great news, not only for Newfoundland but for all Canadians. It is good news for the Canadian Confederation "family." I do not have information immediately available at my desk on the subject of the negotiations with Newfoundland. However, it is the hope of the government that these resources can be brought into production as expeditiously as possible for the benefit of Newfoundland—yes, and for the benefit of all Canada.

Senator Doody: Could the Leader of the Government undertake to get some information for this chamber on whether it is the intention of the two governments to carry on conversations with a view to breaking the impasse that now appears to exist, or is it the intention of the governments to take it to court, resulting in perhaps ten years' or more delay, which the official mentioned in his speech?

Senator Perrault: That question will be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and an inquiry will be made about possible negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Hon. C. William Doody: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government on the Post Office, which we talked about earlier. I thank the honourable senator for his promptness in getting a copy of the statement to me. That is appreciated. I have not had a chance to study it, but in looking through it I notice that the total cost of the settlement is not included. When the leader obtains the other information that we asked for, could he try to get that for us as well?

Senator Perrault: Yes, that inquiry will go forward. I think that measured against the fact that we have achieved a successful postal service negotiation must be measured the other dire alternative that could have occurred, namely, a disastrous tie-up of the postal service and resultant huge economic damage—the terrible primary and secondary effects of a strike or lockout on the economy of this country.

In net, honourable senators, I suggest that this will be a very beneficial settlement for all Canadians.

Senator Doody: I appreciate that, but the point I was making was that the settlement, welcome indeed though it is, will not prove to be a settlement unless all the facets in it are measured against the overall impact on the economy, the public service in Ottawa, as well as the public services in the provinces, all of whom get involved in that spiral.

ENERGY

TERMINATION OF OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION PROGRAM—EFFECT ON ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In view of the fact that the Right Honourable Prime Minister has announced the termination of the Oil Import Compensation Program, can the minister advise us if some form of special assistance will be granted for oil-burning electrical generating plants in Atlantic Canada?

May I, as background, point out that Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have the highest electrical costs in Canada. The termination of the oil import compensation program will double the cost of producing electricity in oil-burning plants.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I don't believe that the interpretation that the Prime Minister's reply announced the termination of the compensation program is accurate. It is an interpretation that has a large element of opinion in it rather than fact. He hoped that a pricing policy for crude oil could be worked out which would phase out the need for the program. It may be only a matter of semantics, but I do not have at this moment a specific answer as to what form an alternative assistance program would take in connection specifically with oil-fired thermo-generating plants, but the honourable senator should take some comfort from the fact that we have indicated that the cost of using these fuels will be relatively uniform across the country.

Senator Phillips: In replying to various questions I notice that the minister usually states that it is a matter of interpretation. The statement in the Commons Hansard is clear that the Prime Minister says the program will be terminated. How can you interpret that in any other way? I know the Prime Minister does not usually mean what he says, but surely that cannot be interpreted in any other way.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, it is a very specific matter of interpretation. When the honourable senator says that the Prime Minister does not usually mean what he says, that is an interpretation with which I totally disagree.

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It is supplementary to those asked earlier by our colleague, Senator Donahoe, relative to the statements attributed to the Chairman of the Quebec Liberal Caucus.

Notwithstanding the welcome optimism expressed by the Leader of the Government, I would ask him to confirm that the Prime Minister of Canada is embarking on these talks fully expecting them to fail—

Senator Olson: That is not right at all.

Senator Murray: —that he expects to pull the plug and call a national referendum on constitutional matters and to unilaterally repatriate the Constitution, and that he so advised his colleagues in the Liberal Caucus this week.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I find a statement of that kind to be rather surprising. Perhaps it indicates the implicit pessimism which is part of the Conservative philosophy in this country. It is regrettable that a great national party can find so little that is constructive to say about this impending series of negotiations with the provinces and, indeed, that it would go so far as to almost express the hope that they will fail.

Senator Olson: That is what keeps them in opposition.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators that those of us who have worked with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister down through the years, particularly in these recent weeks, and have seen the amount of time and effort he has invested in an effort to make these talks succeed, with the object of building a new Confederation—those of us who have seen first hand the degree of zeal that this man has invested in his task as leader of this country, can only have a feeling of repugnance when suggestions are made that he is somehow preparing a scenario for failure. This is not the nature of the Prime Minister, and it is not the nature of the party which has the responsibility for the affairs of this nation at this time.

We are optimistic about these talks. We believe that progress can be made. We know that there are cynics in this country who believe that the talks will not succeed. Some of those cynics are among those who would shatter Confederation, whether they live in the west or the east, and this government intends, with the use of all resources available to it, to ensure the ultimate success of those negotiations.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I understand the optimism the Leader of the Government in the Senate has just shown as to his government's fine intentions with regard to this constitutional conference. However, could he tell us whether the federal government's intentions are as fine as he has just stated with regard to its priority demands for constitutional changes during this conference? What are these priorities which the Prime Minister of Canada will demand from the premiers as regards constitutional changes? Will he insist on the patriation of our Constitution? If not, will he act unilaterally? Will he insist as a priority on the inclusion of language and collective rights in the new Constitution and, in case the provinces refuse these priorities, what is he going to do? What else can he do should the provinces refuse—and this alternative may not be that which the Chairman of the Quebec Liberal caucus has indicated, namely, that you are about to hold a national referendum, over the heads of the provinces, to seek the opinion of the Canadian people on the priorities which the federal government will demand from the provinces?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the distinguished Senator Asselin, who has participated in negotiations of this kind involving other levels of government, knows that one never enters into them with a unilateral determination that the other side shall accept everything on one's agenda. When Senator Asselin asks what the Prime Minister will require and what he will demand, I can only reply that these negotiations which commence on Monday are not being conducted in that spirit. The Prime Minister and the Government of Canada are interested in the views of the provinces. This is a dialogue, which involves constructive proposals from both sides. There are indications from a number of the premiers that progress can be made in many areas, including human and linguistic rights across this country.

I can assure the house that no rigid timetable has been established. No structured agenda has been set. No demands are being made by the Government of Canada that progress be made on a certain number of items. The meeting on Monday is a preliminary one. The distinguished first ministers of the provinces are aware of some of the objectives that have been set forth as suggestions by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. It is hoped that progress can be made, but there is no highly structured, formalized agenda.

If we have achieved anything in the history of this country it is that we have brought about great reforms by means of negotiation, by the process of reasonable men and women sitting down and discussing problems and achieving agreements through a conciliatory attitude, accepting the fact that Canada is a land of immense diversity that takes a great deal of understanding. The government is aware that there are great regional aspirations in this nation, whether they are in western Canada, eastern Canada, central Canada or the north.

As I said earlier, those of us who have worked with the Prime Minister and know his approach to this conference, know that the scenario spelled out by the Conservative Party's chief political architect is inaccurate, doleful and quite mischievous.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether he believes that the Leader of the Quebec Liberal caucus and his Quebec colleagues share the optimism he expresses about the results to come from the conference being undertaken by the Prime Minister?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not for me to speak on behalf of the Quebec caucus, but had it not been for the superb optimism of the Liberal candidates in Quebec during the last election the Liberal Party would not be the government today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Obviously, there is no room for party politics here, though the Leader of the Government would try to resort to them, and I must tell him, in order to reassure him, that we on this side of the house, the Conservative Party and its leader, extend our very best wishes of success to the federal government and the provinces in the new endeavour to be undertaken on June 9. Still, the Leader of the Government always manages to avoid answering our questions.

Senator Langlois: He tries to.

Senator Asselin: It may be, but my questions are so clear he should be able to understand them!

When a meeting is organized, like the one scheduled for June 9 between the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial premiers, it should be done with a purpose in mind. I asked the Leader of the Government if there was an agenda. He was to give me an answer but I am still waiting for it.

I ask him the same question today: what are the priorities, the demands of the federal government; what priorities and demands will it present to the provincial premiers on June 9 with regard to constitutional changes? Will they start by saying unanimity can easily be achieved, that the Senate formula will be modified? Is Senator Langlois slipping him the answer?

Senator Langlois: No, I am trying to understand what you are saying.

Senator Asselin: Will the premiers be told that unless they do such and such the Canadian people will be consulted unilaterally on constitutional changes? I should like to know what the priorities of the Prime Minister are, what the agenda of that constitutional conference will be.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I answer as candidly as possible under the circumstances?

Senator Asselin: You can do it.

Senator Perrault: The reason for the meeting on Monday is to draw up an agenda, in concert with the first ministers from the provinces, and to establish the priorities of both the federal and provincial governments.

It would be presumptuous of the federal government, as I suggested earlier, to go in with a structured agenda and say, "This is the way we are going to proceed with constitutional change, a rearrangement of powers. This is our view with respect to entrenchment of certain human rights, and we expect you to say yes or no." That is not the reason for the meeting on Monday, and that will not be the manner in which the federal government will proceed. It will attempt to achieve, in concert with the provinces, an agenda involving both provincial and federal governments.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: So, I understand there is no agenda. It is simply a discussion between the premiers and the Prime Minister. There is no agenda.

[English]

Senator Perrault: The meeting will be informed and completely private. There will be no newspaper reporters present and no representatives of radio or television. It will be an attempt by reasonable people meeting together to come to terms with the realities of Canada in 1980 and to determine whether they, as good Canadians, can work out the basic pattern that should be adopted in order to achieve the reforms that are needed.

Hon. Azellus Denis: If I understand the Leader of the Government correctly, the priority will be discussed between the government and the provinces and between the provinces and the government—not between the government and Senator Martial Asselin.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Let there be light. We have just been enlightened by the Holy Spirit!

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government arising out of his reply to Senator Donahoe. In his reply he expressed regret that the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition was not joining the Prime Minister in the common front. Does his regret extend to agreeing to have the Leader of the Opposition attend as an active participant rather than assume a minor role?

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Perrault: I believe that all Canadians, regardless of political belief, applauded the gesture of the Prime Minister when he met separately with the Leader of the great Conservative Party and the Leader of the New Democratic Party to discuss the challenge ahead, the priorities, the manner in which we should proceed toward constitutional change and reform. The Leader of the Conservative Party had the right to decide not to participate, as I believe he said, at this stage. That is his right. That is beyond criticism. But many Canadians regret that in an important matter of this kind it was not possible to achieve a certain all-party agreement on the method of proceeding.

Senator Phillips: My question was whether the government would consider allowing the Leader of the Opposition to attend as an active participant and take part in the debate—not whether people applauded the Prime Minister's gesture in meeting secretly with the Leader of the Opposition. I would like an answer to my question, not praise for the Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has declined to participate or to be an observer—

Senator Asselin: That is not true.

Senator Perrault: —and, as I said, it is his right to abstain.

Senator Asselin: That is not true.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Would the Leader of the Government not be more accurate if he were to add that the Leader of the Opposition declined the invitation for the time being because, among other things, he did not wish to be associated with any presentation that he did not help formulate or in which he had no opportunity to participate?

Senator Perrault: I don't have a copy of the statement made by the Leader of the Conservative Party—

Senator Asselin: You should get one before you say anything.

Senator Perrault: —but that may well be the reason he has taken that position. He has the right to that opinion, and we are not criticizing that.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Would the Leader of the Government not agree that had the Parliament of Canada been invited to participate in formulating the proposals to be put forward, those proposals might have even greater possibility of bringing about the result we all desire, namely, agreement?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that would require a very large conference, involving all members of Parliament from both Houses and provincial first ministers and their officials. May I suggest that honourable senators themselves can make a great contribution to this process by supporting a resolution now before the Senate to establish a subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to study some of our views with respect to one aspect of change and reform.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I would not suggest for a moment that the Leader of the Government does not try to understand my question, but he successfully gives the impression that such is the case. I am not talking about inviting the whole of the Parliament of Canada to attend the conference, and he must well know that. I am asking whether he would not feel more satisfied to have the Parliament of Canada participate in the formulation of the proposals to be put to such conferences before those conferences are called.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, surely there is not the suggestion being advanced by Senator Smith (Colchester) that some parliamentarians are being excluded from this process. Let me say, on behalf of our party, both through the route of the Senate caucus and the general caucus of our party, that we have had continuing discussions and meetings on the subject of constitutional reform. There has been no restriction whatsoever on the right of any member of Parliament, whether he serves in the Commons or the Senate, to set forth his views unfettered by any kind of restriction and to provide advice and input into this process. It seems to me that that is what our parliamentary democracy is all about. I can only suggest that the honourable senator engage in similar initiatives within his own Conservative Party Caucus. There are many other ways in which this can be achieved.

Senator Argue: And have your leader articulate.

● (1500)

Senator Smith (Colchester): If the honourable gentleman has something to say, perhaps he has the courage to stand up and say it. If he hasn't, then let him heckle.

I say to the Leader of the Government by way of a question, because this is the Question Period: Would it not seem to him if he were in opposition—and he had some recent experience in that position—that in a matter such as this there should be a concerted effort by the government to encourage Parliament as a whole, and not individual caucuses, to participate in debate and formulation of such proposals?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I favour very strongly a debate on the Constitution in this chamber, and in my view the same debate should go ahead in the other place. Parliamentarians have full access to their respective chambers to debate this question. Certainly there will be initiative here to have precisely that type of debate and discussion in the near future. But beyond that there are opportunities to debate the subject of the Constitution through the means of this subcommittee that has been proposed in the resolution either amended or unamended. There is the caucus route, and the opposition will be in a superb position to advance as many constructive ideas as possible to assist the thinking of the government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The honourable senator still has not grasped the nub of my question, but that may be my fault. I am not talking about action after the fact. I am talking about action before the fact, before the proposals are formulated, and before the proposals are put before the provincial premiers. That is what I am talking about. I am not talking about debating something that has happened.

Senator Perrault: I am having difficulty following the honourable senator's line of reasoning. Surely members of the opposition at this moment should be meeting with their leader and in emphatic and eloquent and impassioned terms be setting forth their hopes for the future of Confederation. They should be trying to inspire their leader and then take their views to the Prime Minister and speak about them in the House of Commons and make public speeches from coast to coast. Surely this is the way political parties operate.

I am very concerned, honourable senators, after hearing another honourable senator's statement earlier, that the Conservative Party believes that there is some sort of conspiracy underway, some sort of plot to assure that these talks are going to fail, that there is such a basic pessimism in the Conservative Party that they are incapable of creating constructive ideas about the future of Confederation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Is not the honourable gentleman aware that one of the usual preliminaries, when successful negotiations are hoped for, is to ensure that any preliminary comments are of a conciliatory nature, and is he not well aware that when those preliminary comments are as provocative as is possible to make them, that that is the very worst way in which to approach a conference in which agreement is hoped for?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, surely the ultimate in conciliatory gestures must be the action of the Prime Minister of inviting the Leader of the Conservative Party into his office for a private meeting.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot recall that when the Right Honourable Joseph Clark was Prime Minister of this country he ever invited the then Leader of the Opposition, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, to come to his office to give him counsel, guidance and assistance on constitutional matters. I cannot recall that.

I do express my concern this afternoon after hearing from the chief political architect of the Conservative Party his view, would you term it, his conciliatory view, to the chamber that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister had deliberately engineered the failure of these talks? Is that the conciliatory attitude that the Conservative Party talks about?

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I simply cannot remain silent after these remarks by the Leader of the Government. When he says we never made constitutional suggestions, I would remind them that in 1972 when a report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on constitutional changes was submitted to the government, that report was shelved. It was never considered.

Secondly, when we got the Pepin-Robarts report, when was it discussed in the house? It was also shelved.

When we got Bill C-60 and it was referred to the Supreme Court for legal consideration, when did we hear about it? It was also shelved. So how can we have faith now in a government which wants to make constitutional changes but which turned a deaf ear to the recommendations of the House of Commons and the Senate on constitutional changes?

Senator Guay: Why did you not bring them out when you were in power?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable Senator Asselin, with his extensive experience in government, knows the long, tortuous and difficult path of federal-provincial relations with respect to the Constitution. Honourable senators will recall the Victoria Conference; honourable senators will recall ceaseless meetings which ended in deadlock because of a lack of consensus or a lack of unanimity. Honourable senators know that record.

Recent events in the province of Quebec have inspired many Canadians to believe that we must make progress this time, and we can only make progress if parliamentarians, regardless of party, engage in these talks in an optimistic frame of mind and dedicate their efforts to success and not to failure.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I listened attentively to what the Leader of the Government in the Senate said earlier about the spirit, the attitude with which the Prime Minister of Canada would embark on discussions with his provincial counterparts. Remembering—and I will try to recall from memory exactly what that letter contained—that in the letter he wrote to the provincial premiers in the spring of 1975, the Prime Minister of Canada who was the same man as today, at that time enumerated the options—pure and simple patriation, patriation with an amending formula, and a third option which involved also extensive changes.

The letter in question raises the possibility that in the absence of a consensus the federal government would consider acting unilaterally.

In light of what the Leader of the Government told us earlier, my question is as follows: Is he actually assuring us that between 1975 and 1980 there was a drastic change in attitudes and that now the provinces would engage in a constitutional dialogue in another context, in another climate than the implicit threat of unilateral action by the federal government?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, many events have occurred between 1975 and 1980. Certainly a new urgency has been added to the whole question of constitutional change, reform, redistribution of powers, and other associated matters. All I can say is that all options are open, and I repeat that the preliminary meetings that have been held between Mr. Chrétien and the provincial first ministers give cause for optimism. I repeat that a rigid agenda has not been set for the meeting on Monday. This is to be an exploratory meeting to develop, insofar as possible, a constructive agenda for future action. The provincial premiers are attending on that basis.

• (1510)

Without doubt, of course, past meetings which have been held regarding these matters and the conclusions of those meetings—all of that material forms part of the background for the talks starting next week. An enormous amount of research has been undertaken not only by the federal government but by the provincial governments to make sure that the talks are productive. That is really all that can be said at this time.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: A supplementary. If I understood the government leader correctly, he just said "All options are open"—which I translate into French as "toutes les possibilités sont ouvertes"—including therefore unilateral patriation?

Senator Langlois: That is your comment, but it is not a question.

[English]

Senator Tremblay: If all options are open, this one might be included. That is why I wanted clarification. Are all options open except that one?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to go beyond the statements I have made, and I hope that my disinclination to comment further on this point will not be interpreted by the honourable senator as further evidence that some sort of plot exists. That is not the case.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I must ask the Leader of the Government if he would be kind enough to make an effort to understand the question I have been asking him now for some little time. He took advantage of the fact that I had asked some sort of question to make a long dissertation about the conciliatory gestures of the Prime Minister. I was not asking about that at all, and I know he is perfectly capable of understanding a question even when not very well put, if he puts his mind to it. So I now invite him to put his mind to a straightforward answer to this question: Is he not prepared to agree to the general proposition that as a prelude to a meeting of any kind at which agreement upon some subject is to be sought, it is best that if any preliminary statements are made they should be of a conciliatory nature?

I want to go one step further and ask him if he is not aware of the statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about the attitude of certain oil-producing provinces, and is he not prepared to agree that those statements were less than conciliatory and therefore not well advised to further a conciliatory attitude at the conference?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think that generally it can be said that the spokesmen for the government have been very conciliatory in the remarks that they have made. I hope that honourable senators will have the opportunity to read the full speech delivered by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is really a remarkably fine discourse, and when the minister suggested that we were not about to see a situation arise where there would be economic sovereignty with political association—and I presume that those are the words that were referred to by the honourable senator—when properly thought out those words have a great deal of relevance, meaning and substance.

There is a view held by most Canadians, I think, regardless of party, that we are a family in this nation, and that when one part of the nation finds itself suddenly rich in resources, there is a responsibility to share with those areas which are less well endowed. Confederation involves sharing one's difficulties and joys and problems and successes in the same way that that process is undertaken in a family. That is why most Canadians are absolutely delighted that resources, petro-chemical resources and fossil fuel resources, now appear to be available in large quantities in the Atlantic provinces. That is a marvellous thing for the Canadian family.

Surely what the minister was attempting to state was that one section of the country must not keep unto itself all of the riches it happens, through the bounty of the Lord and nature, to find in its soil or in its mountains or in its forests or rivers. I think that most Canadians would agree with that basic concept. When read in its totality, the speech was a good speech, and I hope that honourable senators will take time to read the entire text. I think it was misinterpreted by many readers, unfortunately.

As to the general question, should governments or parties or negotiators in any type of negotiation be conciliatory, I think they should be as positive as possible, but in the process of being positive as possible one can also be very strong.

When I talk about the sharing of resources, there has to be sharing in other directions as well. I know that the honourable senator, coming as he does from the maritime provinces, realizes that there has to be a sharing of economic opportunity and a sharing of access to markets and all sorts of other sharing which go beyond the resources which happen to be in the ground. It is a two-way matter, this family concept.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, I thank the honourable gentleman for his exposition, and I may add the hope that when the question of sharing comes to be dealt with, particularly in terms of equalization, he will hold the same views and express them as eloquently as he has now. I would ask him, however, if he cannot understand that I, as a resident of the Atlantic provinces, to whom the preservation of Canada as an entity is of fundamental importance, am just as concerned with the success of the federal-provincial conference as he is, and can he not understand that when I see something that seems calculated—not intended but calculated—to make the success of that conference doubtful and difficult, I feel resentful of the person who created that atmosphere or who seems to have created that atmosphere. As for reading the speech of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I have done so, or at least I have read what came to my desk, presumably from that minister's office and was purportedly the text of the speech. I cannot find in that speech anything which would attribute to the words used a moment ago by the Leader of the Government any meaning except, "If you don't do what we want, we will make you do it." And that, I think, is something that is calculated to make it difficult to have a successful conference in an effort to preserve that thing which we in the Atlantic provinces want above all else. That is why I feel so strongly about it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if I am able to disabuse the honourable senator of the notion that somehow this speech was intended to convey the idea that the federal government has adopted a unilateral approach toward future modifications in Confederation and constitutional changes, I am pleased to do so. That was not the intent of the speech and that is not the policy of the government. Again I suggest that if the full text is read it will be regarded by most Canadians as a very constructive speech.

The honourable senator makes no reference at all in his remarks to certain statements made from time to time by provincial first ministers in the past few months, including premiers from his own region of Canada. These speeches, I read with interest, had been condemned by newspapers in Nova Scotia as being inflammatory and unhelpful. But the honourable senator makes no mention. of those speeches.

Surely, on both sides there has to be a climate of goodwill established. So I do not find myself in disagreement with the honourable senator if that is the thesis he advances.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the leader for his conciliatory words. I would remind him, however, if I may, that had he followed the events and comments emanating from what are supposed to be people in authority in Ottawa, he would easily understand that the Premier of Nova Scotia wished to reiterate Nova Scotia's claim to control over its offshore minerals.

Senator Perrault: I said in his region. Mr. Peckford has been criticized in some newspapers of the Atlantic provinces for certain statements made by him recently. I would not want to misjudge Mr. Peckford, because I have not read the complete text of the speech which brought so much criticism upon his head. I make no personal judgment, but the honourable senator made no reference to that statement made by Mr. Peckford when he came to the Press Gallery in Ottawa just a few days ago.

INDUSTRY

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION, MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY AND NEW COAL MINE OPERATIONS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have been listening intently to the Leader of the Government, and again, according to the Gospel of Saint Ray, what is good for one part of the country is good for another part of the country.

Could he please tell us how soon we will be able to get the moneys that were promised for the development, renovation, rejuvenation, modernization of the Sydney Steel mill, and how soon a decision will be reached on the Michelin development in Nova Scotia? He mentioned fossil fuels. Could he tell us how soon we will be in a position to know when money is going to be provided, money that was promised?

Senator Phillips: In a spirit of brotherhood.

Senator Muir: Yes, in a spirit of brotherhood, Dominus vobiscum! Could he tell us when we will be receiving cash to promote fossil fuels, the Sydney Steel mill and the Michelin tire plant.

I am sure that the leader agrees with the statements I made a few days ago that it was rather ironic that leaders of unions should join forces with giant corporations to tell the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and his government not to dare do anything for the Atlantic provinces with regard to the Michelin tire manufacturing plant. In the 22 years that I was a member of the House of Commons, and in the short time that I have been a member of the Senate—and I am pleased to be with the wonderful people who are here—I have never heard any union from Ontario, backed by the President of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour, say that industry should not go to Brantford, London, Guelph or St. Catharines, but should instead go to Nova Scotia. But we have the reverse happening now in an area where, as the honourable leader knows, the unemployment rate is very high.

I know he does not carry all this information in the top of his head, but I hope he will take notice of these questions and bring us some encouraging information.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I am pleased to take notice of these important questions.

GRAIN

MARKETING OF OATS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, on May 29, Senator Balfour asked when the oat pools for 1977-78, 1978-79 would be closed by the Canadian Wheat Board.

I am pleased to inform the Senate that on May 30 the board closed these pools and the necessary calculations concerning them have begun. I am sure members on both sides of the house will applaud this speedy action by the Canadian Wheat Board subsequent to the question asked by Senator Balfour. So those oat pools have now been closed.

Senator Roblin: Are you suggesting that his question started the thing going?

Senator Argue: I am suggesting that it was a very good question, and following the question, speedy action has been taken. That is all I am saying.

Senator Roblin: There are a few non sequiturs around here.

TRANSPORT

REPORT ON REVIEW OF WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT—EFFECT ON WESTERN GRAIN PRODUCERS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Nurgitz asked when the Minister of Transport would be tabling the report on the Review of the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

This review, which is required by statute, has not been forwarded to me as yet as minister responsible for the act, but I expect to receive it soon. When I have it, I will table it in the Senate. My colleague the Minister of Transport will table it in the other place when he receives it.

GRAIN

CANADIAN GRAINS COUNCIL—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY-GENERAL

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, on Tuesday evening, June 3, Senator Bielish asked the Leader of the Government to comment on a news story concerning the Crow rate. The first paragraph of that article reads:

> VANCOUVER—The artificially low Crowsnest Pass rail rate for hauling grain should be abolished because it will prevent Canada from meeting its grain export goals, says Donald Dever, Secretary-General of the Winnipeg-based Canada Grains Council.

As the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and as one who has studied grain transportation and grain marketing, and in particular the Crowsnest Pass rate, for many years, I must take exception to the statement made by Mr. Donald Dever. I feel that the Crow rate is not the impediment to meeting our export targets in the years ahead. As a matter of fact, it is my judgment that if the Government of Canada and the producers of Canada had depended solely on railway action—and this no matter what kind of compensation those railway companies may have been given—the resulting transportation facilities and delivery of grain would very likely have been inadequate. I think a major factor in the growing improvement in our transportation delivery system has been the addition to the system of many thousands of hopper cars, some paid for by the Government of Canada, some leased by the Government of Canada, some paid for by the Canadian Wheat Board, some now coming on stream paid for by the Province of Saskatchewan, the Province of Alberta, and some 650 cars being put into the system because of leasing arrangements provided by the Province of Manitoba.

Another contributing factor in this vast improvement is the program that has been going on for a few years now providing for branch line rebuilding.

So I say that I do not think that the Crowsnest Pass rate can be held up as the culprit which stands in the way of improved transportation facilities.

Dealing with the future of this rate, I am one who believes that a statutory rate stands in the interests of western Canada, that a statutory rate should remain as far as grain producers are concerned, and that the changes that may come about should come about in accordance with the growing consensus that I see developing in western Canada amongst western organizations as to exactly what changes or modifications should be made in the rate structure of the country.

Some are advocating changes in other rate structures, but the people to whom I look for a consensus are those represented by that great body of organizations which together form the Western Agricultural Conference of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I refer, of course, to the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba pools and their livestock divisions, the United Grain Growers, the Western Cow-Calf Association, the hog producers, the chicken/egg producers, the oil seeds manufacturers, and so on. All of these groups are giving a tremendous amount of attention to the whole question of the freight rate structure as it affects the agriculture industry, both in terms of the primary industry and the secondary manufacturing industries. Solutions to the problems to which I have referred are likely to be forthcoming from the kinds of studies that are now going on.

On this same question, Dr. Hugh Horner, the Federal Grain Transportation Co-ordinator, had some things to say, and again I quote from this article:

> Noting that few people would suggest farmers pay the full cost of moving their grain, he said some sort of subsidy is necessary and "I'm confident that if we allow the farmers themselves to decide it will be done."

He went on to say that a larger part of the improvement for next year would come about as a result of the increased transportation facilities to which I have referred. He also said that the largest single impediment to improved transportation delivery was on the supply side, and he pointed out that 59 per cent of the country elevator capacity along Canadian National Railways is empty today and 40 per cent of the capacity along CP rail lines is empty.

To my mind the Crow rate is blamed for many difficulties to which it has no application whatsoever. As far as this total news report is concerned, I think Dr. Hugh Horner has made some very sensible comment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question following that instructive and interesting dissertation on the part of the minister—a dissertation which I think equals anything that we on this side of the house could do in terms of a lengthy contribution to the Question Period. I congratulate him on his ingenuity and his powers of expression.

Senator Choquette: He is the best.

Senator Roblin: I am sure he is aware that the Assistant Deputy Minister of Transport, speaking in Edmonton quite recently, pointed out in very emphatic terms—and I think correctly—that the question of the Crow rate was indeed the primary question that had to be decided in connection with the whole transportation system in western Canada at the present time. He did give it—and I hope I am not misrepresenting him; I think I am not—he did give it first place. The minister has told us what he thinks the present situation is. I am sure he would agree that it is a very important public matter and one which needs to be addressed.

What leadership is the minister prepared to give to these many associations of which he spoke in terms of the settlement that should be reached in connection with this question? While it is quite true that a consensus is desirable, even a herd of—well, I will not use that metaphor, for it probably would not be suitable. Someone should take the lead in these things, and I think an elected official may have that responsibility.

Senator Argue: I disagree with my honourable friend on a number of grounds, but I congratulate him for opening up what I imagine is yet another dimension of our procedure—and I think it is an excellent one—namely, that when a reply to a question is given on a delayed basis, there may be further questions at that time.

I suppose I am old-fashioned, but I think one should really look with some question at a procedure when assistant deputy ministers or other officials of government go across the country making important speeches on what is undoubtedly a highly controversial public question. To my way of thinking, the whole theory of responsible government is that officials, generally speaking, speak through their ministers. I do not want to get into any great debate at this time as to what this person may have said; indeed, I do not have the text in front of me.

As far as the federal government taking leadership on this question is concerned, I sometimes wonder whether at times so-called leadership by politicians is really leadership or whether at times it might just happen to be interference with a process that is going along very well.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I might have come up in the wrong school, but I sometimes think that a great many things can be accomplished without the press, without a tremendous amount of publicity. I am just a farmer from the hills of southern Saskatchewan, but I know the people I meet when I come to the airport in Regina once or twice a week, and the people I meet are farmers. They are highly skilled businessmen. They know their profession well. They know what they are doing, and they say to me: "Hazen, we are having meetings on transportation policy. We are considering all of the difficulties. A consensus is developing, and our research facilities are providing some of the answers."

These are not just a few farmers who have been gathered up and put in a building and asked to talk until they have decided on something. These are representatives of, and part of, very successful producer-owned multimillion dollar corporations, and I take the attitude that there are times—and this might be the case in this instance—when real leadership and fast leadership may come if the politicians do not get in and try to lead something that is already going along very well.

Senator Roblin: What an admirable theory. I only wish my honourable friend would apply the same logic to some of the other things his government is doing. I will content myself, however, by saying that he is no farmer from the back hills of Saskatchewan. In fact, he leads his army from behind. He is the Duke of Plaza Toro.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is the minister saying that deputy ministers are not permitted to appear before committees of the Parliament of Canada without the approval of their minister and there to give their views about policies of the government?

Senator Argue: In the case of an appearance before a parliamentary committee, my statement does not apply. In all likelihood the minister would be present, although on occasion he might ask the deputy minister to go in his stead. I thought it was at a public forum outside of parliamentary committees. If it were not, then I stand corrected. My impression was that it related to speeches made in various parts of the country.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to get into an extended comment today on the role of deputy ministers or assistant deputy ministers, but I would not agree with my honourable friend that their status is the same as it was in the nineteenth century. Things are changing and they are going to have to take some other responsibilities than the traditional ones. But on the point, the gentleman in question did speak at a public forum in Edmonton, but he also spoke before a committee of this Senate quite recently, and I think that no blame can attach to him, because he responded frankly and fairly to the questions asked.

IMMIGRATION

OFFICES AND OFFICERS ABROAD—BACKLOG OF APPLICATIONS

Question No. 1—By Hon. Peter Bosa:

1. In what countries does Canada have immigration offices?

2. How many immigration officers were assigned to each office on (a) December 31, 1977, and (b) December 31, 1978?

3. What was the backlog of immigration applications in each office on (a) December 31, 1977, and (b) December 31, 1978?

Reply by the Minister of Employment and Immigration:

1. See below.

2. See below.

3. The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission defines backlog in terms of "applications received and recorded . . . on which processing action has not been initiated". According to this definition, on the dates indicated in the immigration offices listed, there were no backlogs of immigration cases. However, it should be noted that processing times vary considerably from country to country, and from one type of application to another. Some of the major factors affecting the difference in processing times are the completion of medical examination and background checks, the receipt and verification of required documentation and the scheduling of interviewing trips to countries or centers away from the location of the office.

1. Canada has 58 immigration offices in 43 countries. They are:

Argentina	Hong Kong	Pakistan
Australia	Hungary	Philippines
Austria	India	Poland
Barbados	Iran	Portugal
Belgium	Israel	Singapore
Chile	Italy	South Africa
Colombia	Ivory Coast	Sweden
Denmark	Jamaica	Switzerland
Egypt	Japan	Thailand
Eire	Kenya	Trinidad & Tobago
France	Korea (South)	United Kingdom
Germany (Federal Republic of)	Lebanon	United States
	Mexico	U.S.S.R.
Greece	Morocco	Yugoslavia
Haiti	Netherlands

2. Immigration Officers Assigned by Post

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WORLD WAR I DISABILITY PENSIONERS

Question No. 6—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Of the 6,113 World War I disability pensioners who were in receipt of the degree of disability between 1 per cent and 47 per cent (as noted in the Veteran's Affairs Annual Report 1978-79), how many have died up to April 1, 1980?

2. Give the same figures for (a) the 75,539 World War II veterans, (b) the 1,802 Special Force veterans and (c) the Regular Force veterans up to April 1, 1980.

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

Statistics regarding the deaths of disability pensioners by degree of disability are not maintained by the Canadian Pension Commission. During the period 1 April 1979 to 31 March 1980, 5,515 deaths of disability pensioners were reported.

The following information concerning disability pensioners in receipt of the degree of disability between 1% and 47% as at 31 March 1979 and 31 March 1980 is provided:

Pensions in Force 1% — 47% as at March 31, 1979 and March 31, 1980

	March 31, 1979	March 31, 1980	Decrease	Increase
World War I	6,111	5,407	704
World War II	75,539	75,159	380
Special Force	1,802	1,826		24
Regular Force	4,612	5,205		593
Totals	88,064	87,597	1,084	617

Of the decrease of 1,084 shown for World War I and World War II pensioners, approximately 975 are as a result of the death of the pensioner. The remainder have been increased to an assessment of disability greater than 47%.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Florence B. Bird moved third reading of Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Before this bill is read the third time, I should like to ask a question of the sponsor. Could Senator

Bird tell me if the $35 increase mentioned in the bill is subject to indexation?

Senator Bird: Yes, just as the GIS and the OAS are.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

June 5, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 5th day of June at 5 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 28, debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies, entitled: "Retirement Without Tears," tabled in the Senate on April 15, 1980.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I know it is a difficult exercise to try to gild the lily, since we have heard many excellent speeches. However, we do have royal assent this evening, and I will restrict my comments in this regard to, hopefully, a good deal less than one-third of an hour. That is a reasonable commitment.

Honourable senators, it is not trite banality on my part to say that I am genuinely pleased to be able to participate in this debate because, in the many years before I came to this place and nursed the hope that some day I might, I noted with great care and much appreciation the work of Senator Croll and the many people who have taken part in the investigative and leadership committees of the Senate. Few can speak with the same detachment as I can, since I was not a member of the committee. Therefore, it is no self-praise for me to commend the report and those who authored it.

This Senate committee has made a splendid contribution to those members of our society of advanced years. They have also taken a great initiative for the whole of society because they have zeroed in and given careful and special study to a unique, continuing and enormously important aspect of our total community.

We in public life—sometimes called politicians—have many roles: we have a legislative role; and we have a role in relation to the people and the regions we represent. However, as Lord Bryce indicated long ago, there is another role, and that is an educative role. I think that the committee, and Senator Croll in particular, has shown outstanding leadership for a long time in presenting, before the Canadian people, the true inwardness of the question upon which the committee began its deliberations.

I was delighted to hear Senator Croll through the media and in person make his appeal to the senior population. Indeed, he uttered something like a rallying cry. He urged them not to take a back seat but to realize their importance and their strength. That brought great joy to my heart although, I suppose with some degree of caution, I could say I do not quite belong to the group myself. I will not have to wait very long.

This study and the emphasis on the study were very much needed because, in our society today, we have come a long way from those earlier societies where to be old was to be honoured. In our highly bureaucratized structure, if we do not in fact say to our older people, "The best place to be is on the shelf or poked off into a home, but for heaven's sake don't stay anywhere near centre stage," the comment is implied. That is quite a change from other societies.

As I gave thought to these remarks this morning, I decided that "venerable" does not really require the suggestion of antiquity, but no one ever refers to a venerable institution that is new or young—we automatically assume that veneration comes with age. That is why it is important for someone like Senator Croll and his colleagues to tell older people in a society where perhaps the accumulation of years is not honoured that, indeed, they are important people among us and they must never lose the sense of their worth, their significance and the profound contribution which they make.

We do not tell ourselves enough that old age has yet its honour and its toil. I want Senator Bird to know that I am not attributing that remark to Longfellow, but to another "understandable" poet—if I may use that word—Tennyson. I think we remember the words of the poets we can reasonably comprehend and even recall down through the passage of time.

I thought there was much sense and some nobility in Senator Croll's appeal to the senior structure of our society. I was deeply moved by his tone and by his priorities.

We are saddened, if we are at all sensitive, when we see economic fears unite with those inevitable hazards and difficulties of growing old. I remember a dear friend of mine, the former Senator O'Leary, literally announce his impending death on television when he quoted Browning and said that only a damn fool would want to grow old. There was a great deal of poignancy in that remark.

When the inevitability of old age is coupled with economic fears—the kind of things which Senator Bird outlined so well when she took part in the debate on Bill C-16—then it is a graphic situation, a disturbing one, and very sad. I remember when she opened her speech and said she was telling a story of concern, loneliness and poverty. She saddened us, but realistically saddened us, when she talked about the far too large sector of our society that is perhaps in Dickens' words, living on broken wittles, and far too little to give comfort and sustenance at any age, let alone at an advanced age.

I had twenty-two years in what we still foolishly call the other place, in other words the House of Commons, and there, as Senators Phillips and Marshall and many others know, there is a somewhat different relationship to the people, if not to the province, because the relationship of a member to a constituent is not equated in the Senate, although the concern of a senator is as acute and as deep as that of a member of the lower house. I would contend that we in our way are not lacking in that essential of the democratic structure, the representation element. In the House of Commons there is an immediacy, and of all the conversations and letters I had those that bothered me most, and that I will always remember, dealt with the very kind of people Senator Bird was discussing when she talked with us and to us, when she mentioned particularly the women, but not only the women.

A thing we have to remember—and there is a little realistic sadness in this—is that women tend to live longer. I have often watched, again with a jolt, when I see tourist groups. A bus will drive up to a hotel and out will step seventy people, about five of them males and all the rest good ladies who have outlived some hard-working husband who has gone to his glory. The immediacy of that daily contact in trying to help these people is painful, extremely painful. We could all talk about many sad tales.

I am old enough to remember the iniquitous means test and all the nastiness that went into it. For $40 you were supposed to go through some motion, turn over the farm and dispose of every asset you had, so that the state could assist you with a few dollars. Many of our citizens, far too many, thought they were going through some kind of formula to qualify, and they very soon found out that their beloved offspring were taking it very seriously, and they did more than qualify for this sum of forty bucks. They had lost the whole farm in the process.

Then—and this is a most reprehensible thing—we found at times the senior citizens were used as election fodder. I do not pretend to be any more sensitive than anyone else, but I will never forget my first election campaign, in 1957, in Prince Edward Island, when we talked to a lady, her daughter and the daughter's husband. The conversation was general. Naturally I wasn't making promises, but we must have been talking about the future of the world. Then, as I went down the lane this elderly lady came to talk to me, where the young people were not able to hear, and she said, "Is it true that if you fellows get in we'll lose our old age pension?" Now some unworthy person had told that woman that. I have an idea who it was. It was someone right in the house saying, "Make sure you don't give support to these people in the opposition." I thought how callous and how cruel that was. My God, was ever a vote so important that you could tear into the heart of a poor old lady and tell her that her whole future was so fragile that she could not engage in the proper exercise of her franchise?

Senator Phillips: They were being very "liberal," weren't they?

Senator Macquarrie: I hear what my colleague Senator Phillips says. I will not go into any more detail, but I am not arguing with him.

Another thing which used to trouble some of us—Senator Marshall is one, and many others—is that we would be very satisfied when an increase was made in the old age security. The next time we saw some of the constituents we cared very much about they would say, "Yes, that's fine. We have an increase of $25, but our rent has gone up $28," or $22, whatever it was. In other words, it would be gobbled up in the twinkling of an eye. Then you would wonder how would we ever get ahead of these things; how would we ever get that degree of social justice that is so deserving and so essential. I agree with what many people in this debate have said, that, as we reflect upon these days and the past, we have in fact come a long way, and thank God we have.

I think, too, of what this chamber, this much abused and little understood chamber, has done in this regard. Many years have gone into a study of poverty, a study of aging and a careful study of retirement, with expertise, with compassion, with devotion from this chamber, a building up of understanding, a powerful educative process. And to think that this very chamber is the one that in 1926—our predecessors, of course—threw out an old age pension bill that had been passed to it from the lower house. We have come a long, long way, and many people in Canada today in their seventies and eighties think very warmly and kindly of Senator Croll, Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), and others who down through the years have given leadership.

I am not just filibustering until someone representing Government House comes, but I want to say how pleased I am to commend what has been done. This has been a fine debate. The information given has been valuable. I have said, being optimistic, that we have come a long way, but we cannot take satisfaction, because there is a long way to go yet.

I was instructed and impressed when Senator Croll put on the record the night he presented the report the fact that many countries have done a better job than we have, especially in their organized retirement plans. In this regard, it is clear that the Scandinavians have done an excellent job. Senator Croll was very apt and precise when he said that in that area we, as a country, have been getting off pretty easily. Those conclusions are worth dwelling upon.

I should also like to say how pleased I was that Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), was the second person to speak, the seconder of the motion and the vice-chairman of the committee.

I am never very comfortable in a chamber like this when we make decisions out of partisan considerations. I think that a chamber on which the executive does not rest in terms of confidence should not be basically a partisan chamber. There are some chambers in the world where people do not even sit in parties; they sit alphabetically. I don't know whom I would end up with under that system, or, what is worse, who would end up with me. This transcends partisanship, and the tributes Senator Fournier paid to the chairman, were gentlemanly, considerate and very appropriate. We admire Senator Fournier's leadership. He has kept abreast of this whole matter and has made sure that none of us forgot the primacy and importance of this issue.

● (1600)

I enjoyed all the speeches. I liked Senator Godfrey's contribution and could not but agree with some of his comments.

Then we get to the nub of the whole question of retirement. The idea of compulsory retirement is painful, and all sorts of useful contributions are shut off as a consequence of it. At the same time, if we have a society in which people literally cannot afford to retire, that, surely, is worse than the loss of productive activity because of the automatic shuffling out of the work force.

So we come back to the situation that it is not easy—it is never easy—in a complex society to set up a rigid formula and say that that must work for all of us. The basic question is before us, and this report, which is the end of a trilogy, as I understand it—and a very fine ending, too—is by no means the end of our consideration of the subject. Indeed, as we noted, even before this committee's report was adopted, another measure has gone through to third reading this very day. It is not a major measure, but is a useful one and everyone here supported it.

I think that the more the public knows about what is in this report, the more they know what the senators have said about it and think about it, the better. I reiterate what I said when I first came in here and said about it long before I came here, namely, that there is more sound thought, common sense and perceptive awareness in this chamber in reference to public matters than people who present flippant opinions in the media even come close to grasping. There is so much wisdom here and so much concern.

I remember one particular group in society that I think illustrates one of the themes of the report, and that is the CUSO group. We all know what CUSO does and about the young teachers and workers who go to various parts of the world. Once in a while they get into trouble, which is natural. They also get argumentative, which does not disturb me at all. If you get a lot of people all thinking the same thing you have a lot of people who are not thinking anything. Down in the United States they have a group called the Peace Corps, which is something like our CUSO. Then there is the other group that these nasty young people call the "paunch" corps. It is a group of retired executives and people of enormous experience who have reached the age of 65. They are supposed to be through, yet we have them all over the world today. They are outstanding Canadians who are doing a most excellent job. I first met them down in the Caribbean, and I am afraid that when I used the expression "paunch" corps, they assumed I was one; but I was not, as a matter of fact. Nevertheless I was very glad to see them. I admired them. They seemed to me to typify the significance and importance of doing something a little more thoughtful, a little more thorough than just looking at calendars and birth certificates.

Senator Croll and his colleagues have given us a demonstrated value in that field, and I commend them, honourable senators, as I commend this report and the work that went into it.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Copies of documents proposed by the Government of Canada for the meeting of First Ministers on the Constitution held in Ottawa on June 9, 1980:
> (1) Suggested Agenda
> (2) Priorities for a New Canadian Constitution
> (3) A Statement of Principles For a New Constitution
> (4) Calendar for Future Meetings

He said: Honourable senators, may I make a short statement in connection with the tabling of these documents, which would really be in the form of a paraphrasing of the statement made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the other place?

It gives me great pleasure to report to you that three weeks to the day after the Quebec Referendum, the first ministers devoted yesterday to constitutional renewal. Yesterday's meeting resulted in a collective decision which can only be beneficial for Canada. All of the first ministers committed themselves to come to major decisions on the Constitution by September. To meet this goal they have a very tight schedule of three months of meetings and negotiations.

We have, in effect, committed ourselves, through our ministers and our public servants, to devote twice as much time to the constitutional problem as the federal and provincial governments spent together over the past two years. That is a sign of the importance and the urgency that the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister attach to renewed federalism and to our Constitution. It is also a sign of our will to keep the promise made to Canadians to bring real and substantial improvements to the fundamental law of the land.

The Prime Minister said, in slightly different words in the other place, that it was our further hope that the premiers would join with the federal government in strong action to give Canada a new Constitution which will be responsive to the needs of the Canadian people. That hope has now become a reality in the form of a federal-provincial commitment. It is, therefore, fitting to pay tribute to the premiers who approached the question in the spirit that made that commitment possible.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister has expressed the following sentiment, and I quote:

> I am confident that the next three months of very concentrated effort will produce, at the next meeting of First Ministers in the second week of September, an agreement on the so-called short list of issues which we discussed yesterday.

He said that a failure to reach a substantial agreement would be nothing short of a catastrophe for Canada.

Again, to paraphrase and quote further, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister said that in that event the federal government would have to review its options seriously and recommend to Parliament a plan of action which would allow us to fulfil our responsibilities to the citizens of Canada.

● (2010)

The agreement that is sought will strengthen the rights and freedoms of the people and define a division of federal and provincial powers which will enable Canada to achieve its great potential. The government is determined that in our progress toward agreement we will not trade off any of the rights or freedoms of the people against the powers of government.

It is the hope of the Prime Minister that honourable senators and members of the other place will continue to discuss constitutional renewal and ensure that we continue to make our contribution towards the building of the Canada of the future.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are grateful to the Leader of the Government for this statement, but it raises several questions which I suppose it would be more appropriate for us to raise during Question Period. In any event, we all look forward with hope to the good that may come out of this three-month discussion of what the Prime Minister considers priority constitutional items.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

JUNE 9 MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the statement made by the Leader of the Government concerning the meeting yesterday between the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of the provinces, he gave us what he called a short list of the questions upon which the Prime Minister hopes he and the premiers can reach a consensus within the short period of three months. I think the Leader of the Government mentioned that the Prime Minister was hoping that the House of Commons and the Senate would be involved in the discussion of these problems.

My question is this: Is the Leader of the Government opposed to having the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs look into other matters, matters in addition to those mentioned in Senator Lamontagne's motion? I think that all the items on that short list, especially, should certainly be considered by the committee I refer to and be included at least in the motion of Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I had intended to speak to the motion that is before the Senate. I think there is great value in proceeding positively with respect to Senator Lamontagne's initiative. It certainly does not rule out the possibility that in addition to this initiative, at some point the Senate may decide to study other aspects of constitutional change and reform. However, there is a very short time frame, and if the Senate or any other body were to take upon itself a comprehensive review of, let us say, division of powers as one of the topics, to complete that subject alone within the time schedule would be a considerable feat. It seems to me that with the discussion concerning the future of the second chamber in our parliamentary system, this subject could well be a priority in the minds of many senators. This, and allied subjects, should perhaps be considered soon by honourable senators.

The so-called "package" made public yesterday—and I have requested the documents back from the Table so that I might review their contents briefly with the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators—has two headings. The first is "Package for the People (Principles, Rights and Patriation)". The list includes a statement of principles; a charter of rights, including language rights; a dedication to sharing and the reduction of regional disparities; and the patriation of the Constitution.

The following are the items under the heading "Package on Government Powers and Institutions": Resource ownership and interprovincial trade; offshore resources; powers affecting the economy; communications including broadcasting; family law; a new upper house involving the provinces; the Supreme Court, for the people and for governments. The subject of Fisheries has been added.

And, to indicate the enormity of the task at hand, let us review the schedule:

> June 17: An organizational meeting of ministers will be held in Ottawa or at some other convenient location. At that time a schedule for consideration of particular items during the summer months would be worked out and agreed upon.
> June 18 to July 6: Governments would prepare for intensive discussions.
> July 7 to July 25: Federal and Provincial Ministers and officials would remain in session (except for weekends) for three weeks, and provision would be made to continue for an additional week if necessary.
> July 26 to August 24: Break in negotiations to allow governments to consider or reconsider positions and to prepare for further intensive discussions. The Provincial Premiers meet in Winnipeg on August 21 and 22.
> August 25 to August 29: Federal and Provincial Ministers and officials meet again.

Honourable senators, this involves dozens and indeed hundreds of people who ultimately will be occupied in this process. It continues:

> August 30 to September 7: Governments consider positions and prepare for First Ministers Conference.

On September 8 to 12, there will be a first ministers conference in Ottawa to reach conclusions on work under way and to put in train a further work program.

Here is an agenda so long and a calendar so full that it will occupy the collective endeavours of hundreds of people between now and September 8.

The suggestion that I make, an opinion offered personally to honourable senators, is that it would be impossible for the Senate, with the resources that we possess, to deal immediately with all of the items in this proposed federal-provincial "package". So I see great merit in the initiative of Senator Lamontagne, and many other honourable senators, who have suggested that we should begin our Senate work with a short list, that we should discuss those items of immediate significance to the status of the second chamber, without, of course, excluding the possibility of examining later other questions. But a start should be made. It is unthinkable that members of this chamber, with their knowledge and expertise, would not wish to be involved in discussing the future of the Constitution and of Confederation.

Honourable senators can see how burdened with work this proposed agenda is likely to be.

Senator Flynn: I did not get exactly the answer for which I was hoping, but, as usual, I am not surprised. I am asking the Leader of the Government: Is he opposed—for whatever reason; he does not have to state reasons—to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs looking into some of those items which deal with the division of powers between the two levels of government, which, in my view, is the root of our constitutional problem?

• (2020)

It is all very well to try to define the role of the new second chamber, but we have first to find out what that role will be with regard to the respective jurisdictions of both levels of government. I am just asking the leader if he is opposed to the amendment which I moved to the honourable senator's motion.

Senator Perrault: The word "opposed" has a rather negative connotation. I say that I support an immediate endeavour by the Senate to provide its views with respect to at least some of the items on the agenda, starting with those matters of immediate concern to the Senate itself.

Honourable senators, I have a complete copy of the statement which was given to the premiers. May I pass it across the aisle to the Leader of the Opposition? I read to honourable senators only a small portion of this document, and when the Leader of the Opposition sees the document he will see how much is involved. I do not think it is possible at this stage for the Senate to adopt an omnibus proposal or to undertake an omnibus study of all of the issues on that agenda. It would not be possible for us to do the kind of work which I believe we must do.

Senator Flynn: Then I must take your reply as being "no" to the study by this committee of the problem of the division of powers. Am I right?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am basically opposed to the amendment which has been advanced.

Senator Flynn: Very good.

Senator Perrault: But that does not rule out other Senate work with respect to the Constitution.

Senator Flynn: That is what I wanted to know. In any event, with regard to this suggested agenda, and the other documents to which the Leader of the Government referred in his statement, perhaps it would be useful to have them printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Senator Perrault: That is an entirely agreeable suggestion, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of documents see appendix, p. 438).

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the government leader. Several times prior to this constitutional conference I asked the government leader whether the federal government was going to submit to the provinces a list of priorities. We now know that there is a list of items, contained in an agenda, to be studied over the next three months. Can the government leader tell us what are the federal government's absolute priorities in this list so that the September meeting can be considered a success? Will success depend on the approval of the entire agenda, or all the items, or are there certain essential items that the federal government would want the premiers to adopt and which would determine the success of that meeting?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the agenda distributed at the outset of the meeting on Monday had three points on it.

Senator Flynn: We have them.

● (2025)

Senator Perrault: Some honourable senators may not have them. They are:

1. Review of developments since the Constitutional Conference of February 1979

2. Principles for a New Canadian Constitution

3. The Process for achieving a new Constitution including:

(a) the subjects to be given priority consideration;

(b) the arrangements for federal-provincial meetings and other work over the coming months.

So the priorities were set forth as a result of that meeting. I read the list just a moment ago.

Without going through it again in great detail, a Statement of Principles for a new Constitution was number one. A draft of that statement is included in the documents given to the Leader of the Opposition this evening. That Statement of Principles relates to language rights, the cultural diversity of the nation, fundamental freedoms—

Senator Asselin: That Statement of Principles was not accepted by the premiers.

Senator Perrault: Again, I repeat, a list of priorities was agreed upon by the premiers. It is hoped an agreement in substance will be achieved by September. The proposed list of items is as follows:

A Statement of Principles

A Charter of Rights, including language rights

A dedication to Sharing and/or to Equalization: the reduction of regional disparities

The Patriation of the Constitution

Resource Ownership and Interprovincial Trade

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Offshore Resources

Fisheries

Powers affecting the Economy

Communications, including broadcasting

Family Law

A new Upper House, involving the provinces

The Supreme Court, for the people and for governments

That does not mean to say that agreement has been achieved on all of those matters, of course. These subjects will be under intensive discussion in the next few weeks, and consensus will be sought.

Senator Marshall: The upper house will be the scapegoat.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: That is exactly what I want to know. The Leader of the Government has not answered my question. I asked him which are the priority items which the federal government feels should be dealt with if the September meeting is to be considered a success? The reason I am asking this question is that the Prime Minister has indicated during his press conference that it would be disastrous for Canada if the September meeting were to end in failure.

I suggest, therefore, that the federal government must have criteria on which to base its judgment whether the September meeting is a success—for instance, if the parties involved agree on such and such a priority item that appears on the agenda. Must each and every item on this agenda which the Leader of the Government in the Senate has just read be accepted by the provinces before the September meeting is considered a success?

What I mean to say is this: Suppose they do not agree on the question of a new Upper House, although they might have agreed on all the other priorities, would that simple fact mean that the meeting was a disaster?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can understand the desire of Senator Asselin to have a definitive answer to that question, but that kind of reply is impossible. It is not likely that agreement will be achieved in absolute detail with respect to all of the items on the agenda. Indeed, in the ultimate, that which might be construed as a "success" for one level of government, a province, might be construed as a failure for another level of government or province.

Speaking of "priorities," however, I think, significantly, that at the meeting on Monday an important document was presented by the Prime Minister. Indeed, it was circulated to the premiers well in advance of that meeting. It was entitled: "A statement of Principles for a New Constitution."

Senator Asselin: It was distributed on the Friday.

Senator Perrault: It was distributed in advance. These are some of the items which were placed before the premiers as a first priority by this government. I quote only part of it:

Faithful to our history, and united by a common desire to give new life and strength to our federation, we are resolved to create together a new Constitution which:

shall be conceived and adopted in Canada,

shall reaffirm the official status of the French and English languages in Canada, and the diversity of cultures within Canadian society, shall enshrine our fundamental freedoms, our basic civil, human and language rights, including the right to be educated in one's own language, French or English, where numbers warrant, and the rights of our native peoples, and shall define the authority of Parliament and of the Legislative Assemblies of our several Provinces.

We further declare that our Parliament and provincial legislatures, our various governments and their agencies shall have no other purpose than to strive for the happiness and fulfillment of each and all of us.

The fact that the federal government brought that statement to the Monday meeting and presented it to the premiers as one of the key documents indicates the priority which we give to this document.

Senator Asselin: It was not accepted.

Senator Perrault: It won, generally, a favourable response.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: In his press conference the Prime Minister said that the statement of principles gave rise to exchanges of views between the premiers and that there was no unanimity on the statement. This is an important point.

I think that in the next few days the government leader should be in a position to describe some criteria on which the government will insist so that the September conference will be successful or disastrous for Canada, because there will be some consequences. The Prime Minister of Canada must indicate to Canadians what he will consider a success, what will be the points on which the premiers will have to agree in September, because the Prime Minister stated that if it was a success, it was quite possible that he would take a decision concerning his political future. If not, he would take a better aim and see how the Constitution could be amended. And of course we could elaborate on the entire matter of a national referendum. So far so good.

I think that Canadian taxpayers are entitled to know in advance what are the criteria the government finds essential for that September conference to be successful.

• (2030)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, there will be extensive discussion about provincial and federal priorities during the weeks and months to come. It will probably be the most intensively discussed agenda in the history of this nation, and the federal government will bring its thinking to these meetings which are to be scheduled in the weeks to come. I think there will be little doubt about the federal government's priorities as a result of those meetings, and that information will be openly available in the process of communication.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I am going to put a real question to the Leader of the Government in an attempt to better judge the progress that may have been made at yesterday's conference in terms of the presentation and the contents of the list of items that were finally agreed upon as being priorities.

In the June 9 release, the one actually tabled at the beginning of the conference and released on the previous Friday, various items are set out in two columns, the first being entitled "Package for the People," and the second, "Package on Government Powers and Institutions." In the June 10 release, the one tabled today, the items no longer appear in two columns. There is only a list.

Is that division in two categories—one presumably for the people and the other presumably for governments—is that division now excluded? Personally, I am glad because I find it odious, in view of the nature of the subject matters, to say that, on the one hand, these are subject matters of concern to the people, and, on the other hand, subject matters of concern only to the governments. It seems to me that in both cases the people are always the goal; to serve the people is always the common goal even of the division of powers. That was my first question with regard to the developments.

My second question is: On the June 9 list, fisheries was not included but it appears on the June 10 list. Does this mean that progress has been made during the discussions? Or is it rather on the initiative of the federal government or of some provinces that such an addition was made? It seems to me the answer to those questions would shed some light on what the Leader of the Opposition called earlier some kind of very firm consensus on well-identified priorities about which, precisely, the questions put earlier by Senator Asselin should actually be asked. In order to judge whether the September conference is a success or a failure, will all those questions be treated equally?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the list under two headings, a "Package for the People" and a "Package on Government Powers and Institutions," the so-called "list" developed on June 9, is the list tabled this evening in the house. The honourable senator refers to one "consolidated" list. I don't have such a "consolidated" list in my possession at this time. The list that I tabled was under the two headings cited a "Package for the People" and a "Package on Government Powers and Institutions."

Senator Tremblay: Is it dated June 9?

Senator Perrault: Yes, it is dated June 9.

Senator Tremblay: And there is another one dated June 10.

Senator Perrault: Well, perhaps we can confer later this evening and study the list that is in the possession of the honourable senator. In any case, I am not disputing the fact that the honourable senator has some copy of the list. I suspect, however, that essentially identical items appear on both lists, "packaged" or not.

Senator Tremblay: Not fisheries.

Senator Perrault: The subject of fisheries has been added to the list tabled by me this evening.

Senator Flynn: On which side?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would assume, but only assume, that the subject of fisheries was added by one of the premiers from either the east coast or the west coast.

Senator Marshall: Certainly from the east coast—the Province of Newfoundland.

Senator Perrault: I doubt whether the subject was suggested by premiers whose provinces include Lake Diefenbaker or Lake Winnipeg.

Honourable senators, would you permit me to make this observation? A few days ago the Honourable Senator Murray purported to question the motives of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. It was suggested that he would deliberately attempt to promote failure at the meeting on Monday so that he could go to the people with a referendum. We remember the dire warnings sounded by Senator Murray of the Conservative Party. But we had a meeting on Monday and it was a relatively successful one. Well, we had a meeting on Monday, and it was an encouraging and successful meeting. Honourable senators, let us ask ourselves how many meetings have been held involving the premiers of the various provinces, and the diversity of interests which they represent, where total success has been achieved within eight hours? Very few. None. Monday's meeting was a good meeting, and I think we can be optimistic about the future.

● (2040)

Senator Flynn: We will not be as foolish as you are. We will not continue on that theme.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs indicated in the other place on June 3 last that the $35 increase in the GIS under the Old Age Security Act would be exempted from the veterans' War Veterans Allowance when the veteran reaches the age of 65, and in view of the fact that under the present legislation there is an exemption of only $15 for a single veteran and $30 for a married veteran, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate to this chamber the manner in which the government would be introducing the exemption to the $35 increase in the GIS to veterans receiving War Veterans Allowance or Civilian War Allowance, whether it be by way of amendment to the legislation or by order in council, and when that exemption would go into effect?

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall discuss the matter with my colleague the Honourable Daniel MacDonald, Minister of Veterans Affairs. Hopefully, a reply can be provided shortly. The Honourable Dan MacDonald, in my view, is one of the most effective ministers we have ever had in the portfolio of veterans affairs.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: I say that, and I know the Leader of the Opposition agrees the minister is a man who gave much of himself in the service of his country in the Second World War. I assure honourable senators that he is now attempting to devise improved programs to help the veterans of this country.

Senator Flynn: That will suffice.

Senator Perrault: I hope that program will be announced shortly.

Senator Marshall: I have to admit that, in co-operation with the opposition while I was Veterans Affairs critic, the minister has done a lot for veterans. I have a supplementary and related question, and it has to do with the introduction by the previous government of Bill C-28, which would have reduced the qualifications for widows of veterans, the widows of those veterans who died under the ratio of 47 per cent. The previous government was willing to introduce a new formula whereby widows of veterans under the ratio of 47 per cent would also qualify.

As a result of the fact that Bill C-28 was not reintroduced, and in view of the fact that a question that I placed on the order paper gives me the answer that 1,084 widows of veterans will now be excluded because the veterans died between March 31, 1979, and April 1, 1980, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise this chamber as to when Bill C-28—a bill which would do so much for the widows of veterans, many of whom are the widows of First World War veterans, who are dying off at the rate of 5,515 a year—will be reintroduced so as to provide for those widows the benefits that they deserve for the many years that they looked after their suffering veterans.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a good deal of attention has been accorded that particular problem in recent weeks, and it is certainly a high priority of the government and certainly of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Honourable senators can feel confident that the party which gave the veterans of Canada the finest post-war program in the entire world will not let them down on this issue.

Senator Flynn: When are you going to give just a reply to a question?

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I must agree with the Leader of the Government that the benefits under the Veterans' Charter are good. However, in view of the fact that the statistics of the Department of Veterans Affairs show that 5,515 veterans die each year, and in view of the fact that many of them are First World War veterans, the widows of these veterans are being denied widows' benefits, and many of these widows looked after their veteran husbands for many years. They have been completely devoted and completely taken away from society.

In view of the fact that over the next four or five years the widows of First World War veterans—and I think there are only about 7,000 left on disability pension—will be denied those benefits because of death, would the Leader of the Government try to impress upon the government the necessity of protecting these widows and that, on a priority basis, the changes in the disability pension provisions would provide the benefits for those widows who have been looking after their husbands and who have been denied these benefits for so many years and who themselves do not have too much of a life to live in the next few years?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has eloquently set forth the problem facing a number of veterans' widows in this country. Only yesterday I dictated a letter to one of these widows in Victoria, British Columbia, and she, in turn, had received a letter from the Honourable Daniel MacDonald indicating that he hopes that early action can be taken.

Honourable senators, we are very aware of the problem, and hopefully something can be done.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HAITIAN REFUGEES—CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it concerns the desire of people in the Caribbean to escape the situation in which they are living and come to Canada. I am thinking particularly of the answers which the Leader of the Government gave to my colleague Senator Nurgitz concerning those people leaving Cuba who were described the other night as "asylees"—an expression which strikes me as the perigee of gobbledygook, and I am sure the Leader of the Government was not responsible for it. Rather, it is likely these anonymous people who come up with such terrible clankers as "disincentives."

To get away from a literary criticism, I should like to ask the leader whether the government is looking with compassion and concern upon the many people from Haiti who are under very serious political and economic disabilities and who are desirous of coming to this country and whether, in its even-handed compassion, the Government of Canada is taking some steps to accommodate people from Haiti who would like to come here and the number which the government feels it can take at this first stage.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

RIGHTS OF SHAREHOLDERS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Is the leader satisfied that all of the rights of shareholders of companies under the Canada Business Corporations Act are preserved and continued under the Nova Scotia Companies Act when approval is given by the Director of the Corporations Branch for the transfer of the jurisdiction of such companies from the federal government to the Province of Nova Scotia? I am thinking specifically of the United Canso Oil and Gas scenario, a situation with which, I am sure, the minister is familiar.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a technical question and one which I have not had the opportunity to discuss in advance with the honourable senator. It seems to me that this is a question that he may wish to have studied by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of the Senate. In any case, I would be pleased to endeavour to find any information that may be available.

Senator Muir: I thank the leader, and I would appreciate it if he would take the question as notice and see what else he can find out.

• (2050)

In view of the recent articles appearing in the Toronto Star and the Wall Street Journal regarding United Canso Oil and Gas, a Canadian company, will the minister satisfy himself that removing directorship requirements as to residency, which I understand some provinces may permit, will not adversely affect the shareholders of this Canadian resource company?

Senator Perrault: I understand there is a vigorous proxy battle under way with respect to this particular company. I think it would be extremely hazardous for me to offer an offhand opinion on such a technical matter.

HOUSING

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—MORTGAGE FUNDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. We have all been concerned about the slump in the housing industry, and recently the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation made a statement with respect to it, in which he said that the policy of the government was about to be changed, that instead of helping mortgagors they were now going to deflect the money that was to be used for that purpose and turn it over to helping the construction industry. Can the Minister of State for Economic Development indicate to us if the government, in deciding to help the construction industry, is considering the policy of eliminating the 12 per cent federal tax on building materials which has for so long been advocated by the Progressive Conservative Party.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): On a question as specific as the consideration of this particular tax, or any other tax, I am sure the honourable senator will understand that announcements of that nature are made by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Donahoe: If the minister is unable to be specific in answer to that question, is he able to share with us any of the general details of the policy alternatives being considered by the government in lieu of the mortgage tax credit proposal?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator knows very well that this government, or indeed the previous government, does not discuss, or indeed make public, all the matters they are considering, until such time as they are ready to make an announcement. I will ask the minister responsible what at this time he is prepared to provide by way of the various items and alternatives he is considering. I would not tonight be able to make that kind of announcement, so I will have to take that question as notice.

Senator Donahoe: If the minister is unable to tell us what the government is considering in any way, shape or form, can he tell us if they have reached a decision to abandon, once and for all, the mortgage tax credit proposal that the previous government had introduced? Do we now know that that is no longer a policy to be brought into effect by government?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator will recognize that for anyone in public life to use the word "never" is a very foolish thing, because sometimes conditions change so the things that ought not to be done now ought to be done somewhere down the line. I think the honourable senator will recall the debate that took place, a highly visible public debate, in which we said that in our opinion that was an unfair method of dealing with the situation, because the distribution of the benefits was not equal. That was well known to the electorate of Canada when they made their decision as to whom they wanted to govern this country for the next four or five years, and I think the honourable senator got his answer loud and clear.

Senator Marshall: They made a mistake.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Does the minister recall if the previous Minister of Finance, when he presented his budget in the other place on December 11 last, had in that budget a provision for the elimination of the 12 per cent tax on building materials, as mentioned by the Honourable Senator Donahoe?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am trying to get some quick advice here. I am not sure. However, I have been advised that we really ought to use the right figure. It is not 12 per cent, it is 9 per cent. I will have to check that budget. Unfortunately, as honourable senators know, there were a few things that were acceptable in that budget, but the totality of it was absolutely unacceptable to the people of Canada, and of course when you defeat a budget it all goes down.

THE ECONOMY

ASSISTANCE TO SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was interested in the minister's discourse on changing one's mind and the dangers of the absolute expression "never." I am reminded of how long "never" lasted in connection with the indexing of income tax on a previous occasion, and I am tempted to ask the minister whether he is preparing the public mind for another flip-flop on that interesting question. I dare say he will tell me to wait until I see the budget, so I will anticipate his reply by asking him, while he refuses to speculate on what may be in the budget to come, if he will tell us what is being done on the budget in hand, if you call the non-budget that was delivered by the Minister of Finance on April 21 such a thing?

Among the other good features of the Progressive Conservative budget of last December that were picked up by the minister on April 21 last was one having to do with the small business development bond. I think the minister will be aware, without my trying to explain it to him, that this plan was introduced last December as a means of assisting small business in an atmosphere of high interest rates. I do not think the minister would argue that interest rates have reached such a low point that we can dispense with that particular piece of legislation. In any case, it was brought down in the ways and means motion, or whatever its correct description is, on April 21, but we have not seen the bill.

My question is this: As the ways and means motion indicated that the effective date for these bonds would be from December 11 last year to the end of 1980, does the minister not think it time that the legislation designed to give effect to this ways and means resolution was introduced in Parliament?

Senator Olson: It is a fact that there is some validity to the time-lag with respect to this, and I might say a number of other matters that this government has given a firm indication it wants to deal with in this session. Unfortunately, we do have a limited number of days, and also a very large obligation to those days to deal with matters that, if the rules in the other place are followed, we do not have very much control of. If you look at the legislation that has been introduced, there is not very much new, aside from these bonds and a few other things. The guaranteed income supplement was one, which is now passed. Other than that, we have an obligation to clean up the legislation that was left over from not only the last session but the session before that too. There are some very severe time constraints with respect to that, with some dates on them. There are a few other things that perhaps would cause a great deal of difficulty if they were not dealt with between now and, let us say, the end of this month, such as the Small Business Loans Act, the Fisheries Loans Act and two or three others, where there are termination dates as to what service can be offered by those agencies of the government unless some legislative action is taken.

It is not really a problem of unwillingness to introduce this legislation, for all the pressure my honourable friend has just described, but within the number of days available and the obligation to assign a certain number of days to the opposition and, for other reasons, there are very severe restrictions on what new legislation can be introduced until the present situation is cleaned up.

Senator Smith (Colchester): More excuses.

Senator Olson: No excuses at all.

Senator Roblin: May I ask a supplementary question based on what my honourable friend has been talking about? I daresay that he has been very busy, but I remind him that this concept has been in the hands of the drafters since at least December 11 last. It seems to me that within a space of six months it is possible that they could have produced a piece of legislation to give effect to this matter. However, if they could not, I would like to know why my honourable friend's government saw fit to re-introduce the matter on April 21 without giving some warning to the world at large as to what the state of this alleged ways and means promise was going to be, because this too has a time limit which is the end of this year.

If my honourable friend's administrative advisers, legislative programmers, or whomever he relies upon are unable to do any better than they are doing now, would my honourable friend consider giving an assurance to small business that the legislation will ultimately come and that it will be appropriate for them to go ahead now and make their necessary small business bond arrangements? If we have this proposed legislation hanging around for six months, contained in the ways and means of April 21 expiring at the end of this year, and nobody can use it, then what good is it? Can my honourable friend not give some assurance to the people whom this bill is designed to help—he wants to help them, and I want to help them—to enable them to make use of this good idea before it is too late?

Senator Olson: I assure my honourable friend that I will communicate with my colleague, the Minister of Finance, no later than tomorrow and try to obtain the information. I feel that my honourable friend has made a reasonable request in asking for assurance that this will be brought in and, as has been pointed out, be retroactive to December 11 of last year.

I must constantly remind my honourable friends opposite that they should not take lightly the time constraints. They are not designed by this government; they are there, and they allocate the days.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Excuses!

Senator Olson: My friend says, "Excuses"; he does not have more than seven days a week, and under the parliamentary rules he does not work more than five days a week.

Perhaps I ought not to say this, but things in the other place could be expedited somewhat with further co-operation from the opposition. It is possible for them to deal with more than one bill a day if they want to, but I am not criticizing them. When I was in the opposition, we used to debate matters at length sometimes, and there was usually some reason for it, but in the interests of this and other matters, perhaps the best advice I can give my honourable friend is that he should ask his colleagues on the other side to help us to get through this backlog in the remaining number of days.

Senator Smith (Colchester): They are a pretty feeble bunch.

Senator Roblin: I did not say that myself, but I certainly subscribe to the sentiment; they are a pretty feeble bunch.

When we were dealing with the bill for the relief of old-age citizens in this country, to provide them $35 more—a bill which, I must say, was not originated by anyone in the opposition, even when they were the government—is it not true that there was no problem in passing that legislation, and is it also not true that there was no problem in dealing with that bill in the House of Commons? Was there a filibuster? Was there any problem in this house when it came in? No, we dealt with it expeditiously and, I think, gladly.

This piece of legislation which I am talking about has a double parentage: It was introduced in the first instance by the Progressive Conservative government; and it was picked up in the second instance by the Liberal government. What grounds would there be for thinking that there would be obstruction, as my honourable friend seems to imply, in introducing a bill of this kind now?

I am afraid my honourable friend cannot introduce this bill in this house, for obvious reasons, but if he can persuade the Minister of Finance—and I am pleased that he is going to speak with him tomorrow—I am not taking much of a chance by telling him that it will go through the two Houses of Parliament in double quick time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would be very pleased to convey that commitment to the Minister of Finance, and I am sure he will be very glad to receive it, however widely it may be supported. I take it that is a very firm commitment.

TRANSPORT

ABANDONMENT OF RAIL LINES IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: My question is directed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Would the minister indicate if he is in agreement with the stated intention of his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to rescind Orders in Council, 1980-83, and 1980-84, an action which, if taken, would result in the abandonment of some 30 branch lines in the prairie provinces which serve the needs of the producers and the elevator companies?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): In reply to the honourable senator, I do not think it is correct to say that the Minister of Transport has said that he will make a recommendation that those lines be taken out of the permanent system.

I very much appreciate that these lines are important to the producers who live along them. I believe it would be a major step to bring out of the permanent system something that has been placed in the system until the year 2000. I certainly feel that there are many arguments that should be considered in favour of keeping those lines in the permanent system.

I may even go further and say that there may be lines not now in the permanent system to the year 2000 which may warrant the same kind of consideration that has resulted in other lines going into the permanent system. Therefore, the lines in the permanent system are not likely to be taken out without a great deal of study, discussion and consideration.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

JOB CREATION PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is for either the Minister of State for Economic Development or the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with the job creation program announced recently by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This program is designed to assist the disadvantaged: women, youth, handicapped, native peoples, refugees, former prisoners and the poorly educated.

Under the Canada Works Program, which would appear to be a similar program, senators did not participate. This was indicated to me, as a former member of Parliament, by the then Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us some assurance that those senators particularly interested in the disadvantaged parts of the country could have full participation in this program, and access to the information emanating from the Department of Employment and Immigration in order to ensure that those programs are directed to those people to whom they should be directed?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I want to assure Senator Marshall that if he has suggestions concerning the allocation of funds in his area, he should feel quite free to write the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, and express his views.

The honourable senator is quite correct in emphasizing the importance of this program. There will be a series of measures totalling $137 million in this fiscal year to respond to the critical and immediate employment problems faced by many Canadians—many of them in the honourable senator's area.

Does the honourable senator suggest that there should be a consultative mechanism established in each region involving senators in some formalized manner? Perhaps that is what the honourable senator is suggesting.

Senator Marshall: I have a supplementary question. Besides the members in the other place who are named with regard to the consultative process, I would like to point out that there are senators who are just as involved, just as interested in the good of the parts of the country they represent, and who should be a part of that process. In the endeavours I made as a member of the other place this was not so. I am therefore asking the Leader of the Government if he would bring to the attention of the minister the fact that senators should be participating in the consultative process so that the benefits of the program may be directed to those areas concerned.

Senator Perrault: I think the Honourable Senator Marshall has advanced an idea with real merit. I shall certainly discuss it with my colleague the minister.

INDUSTRY

GRANT TO MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, a very significant event occurred in Nova Scotia over the weekend, and here I am not speaking about the selection of the new leader of the Liberal Party, important as that may be. I am speaking of the even more important agreement that was signed between the Province of Nova Scotia and the federal government by the Premier of Nova Scotia and the Deputy Prime Minister regarding assistance to the Michelin Tire Corporation. This has been raised by Senator Smith, Senator Donahoe and others.

I would ask the Leader of the Government, and, indeed, the Minister for Economic Development—and I am sure I speak for thousands of Nova Scotians—if they would commend the federal government and the Government of Nova Scotia for coming to this happy arrangement, despite the fact that such intensive lobbying was carried on in even the highest offices in this Parliament by people opposing their working "brothers" in Nova Scotia. When I say this I speak as one who has been active in the labour movement, though only for about half the period that can be claimed by our honourable and gracious Speaker.

Would both the ministers I referred to please express the commendation—I am sure I can speak for them—of thousands of Nova Scotians to the federal government and the Government of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator has commended this government for its assistance, which has already been announced, for this program. There may be an opportunity to speak to this, and also with regard to the Sydney Steel Corporation—

Senator Muir: That was to be my supplementary.

Senator Perrault: All this and heaven too.

On Saturday, June 7, the Minister of Finance announced, as the honourable senator stated, the signing of a federal provincial subsidiary agreement for a grant to Michelin Tires (Canada) Limited. This agreement, developed by DREE of the Nova Scotia Department of Development, will provide $56 million in assistance to Michelin, of which $42 million will be federal and $14 million the provincial share.

As a result of the federal-provincial funding—and this is often ignored by those who comment on this issue—a $400 million expansion program by Michelin Tires (Canada) Limited in Nova Scotia will now proceed. There is an enormous investment from the private sector. The program includes the construction of a new plant at Waterville. This Annapolis Valley community will be the recipient of the multi-million dollar radial tire manufacturing facility, which, when in full production, in an estimated four years, will provide in excess of 1500 new job opportunities in a region now heavily dependent on seasonal work operations.

Senator Asselin: Answer! Answer!

Senator Perrault: In addition, the company is planning expansion of its existing steel tire cord manufacturing facilities at Bridgewater, and a major addition to its rubber mix manufacturing operation at Granton.

Job potential will be increased at the Bridgewater plant by 230 and at Granton by 120, creating a total of 1,850 new, year-round skilled or semi-skilled employment opportunities. That should considerably add to the payrolls in that area.

I now come to SYSCO. The federal commitment for at least $50 million for a realistic rehabilitation of SYSCO, based on a—

Senator Asselin: Did you ask leave to revert to motions? Or are you answering the question?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may not have been listening earlier, but I was asked a question by Senator Muir on June 5—

Senator Muir: On a point of order here, if the honourable the minister is going to give us some good news on the Sydney Steel plant, please let him continue.

Senator Perrault: The question was asked on June 5, and since that time we have spent many hours amassing this information. I am determined that the Senate shall hear it.

The federal commitment for at least $50 million for a realistic rehabilitation of SYSCO, based on a business plan for SYSCO which draws upon completed business studies, remains valid. The federal commitment is going to be kept.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

REPORTED DEFICIT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Doody during Question Period on June 4 concerning Canada's merchandise trade deficit in April.

I would like to assure honourable senators that the deficit recorded in merchandise trade during the month of April is not viewed as the beginning of a trend. Month-to-month changes in exports and imports often reflect irregular movements, making meaningful analysis of the monthly merchandise trade figures difficult. Recent experience is no exception. In April, the trade balance fell to a deficit position of $7 million, and the March figures recorded a merchandise trade surplus of $649 million. On a balance of payments basis, the year-to-date trade surplus amounts to $1,748 million ($5.2 billion at annual rates), up considerably from the surplus of $760 million ($2.3 billion at annual rates) recorded over the first four months of last year.

On a customs basis, exports declined 2.9 per cent in April, after increasing by 1.8 per cent the previous month. The export declines were concentrated in the broad categories of food products (down $69 million or 11.4 per cent), fabricated materials (down $220 million or 9 per cent) end-products (down $113 million or 6.2 per cent). Amongst fabricated materials the largest declines were for lumber, pulp, chemicals and non-ferrous metals. The weakness in exports of end-products was accounted for by passenger cars, aircraft and other transportation equipment.

Imports on a customs basis rose 6.2 per cent in April, after rising by close to 7 per cent in March. Sizeable increases were recorded for coal, crude petroleum, chemicals, and motor vehicle parts.

ENERGY

DELAY IN DEVELOPMENT OF ALSANDS PROJECT—EFFECT ON ONTARIO

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Balfour on June 4. It is a long, two-page reply, and I would ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, on June 4 the Honourable R. James Balfour asked for some information relative to employment effects of the Alsands Project in the Athabasca oil sands area. He wished to know what the effects of a delay in the project would have on potential new jobs lost in Ontario. While we do not have the information with specific reference to Ontario employment, I can provide employment statistics relative to Alberta and the rest of Canada, consequent upon the opening up of this important new oil development project.

Construction Phase: In the first year of the Project the total number of workers engaged in construction would be relatively small, not in excess of 1,000, but employment at the Project would peak at 9,600 in the third year of construction. This construction work force would rapidly decline to zero two or three years later. These employment figures relate to construction workers on the plant, the new town and related infrastructure. Another way of expressing the total employment during construction would be to say that it would involve 48.6 million man hours of employment. Sixty percent of the work force employed on direct construction would come from Alberta, thirty-five percent from the rest of Canada and five percent from foreign sources.

Engineering Phase: In addition to workers employed directly on construction, there would be employment of 6.4 million man hours on engineering and management services for the plant, the new town and the infrastructure. One-half of these requirements would be from Alberta, 25-30 percent from other parts of Canada and about 25 percent from foreign locations.

Operations Phase: Once the Alsands plant went into production, 2,800 workers would be employed in this phase. All of this work force would be recruited within Canada, 60 percent from Alberta and 40 percent from the rest of the country.

Employment Multiplier Effects: Indirect employment impacts—the multiplier effect—will be of the same order of magnitude as both the construction and operations employment, that is to say, the employment generated in other industries as a result of the Alsands Project will be about equal to the direct employment in the construction phase and in the operations phase. The division of this work force, as between Alberta and the rest of Canada, would be similar to that applying to the direct employment.

FORESTRY

FIRE DAMAGE—ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a further reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin respecting forest fire assistance. This reply is three pages long. I am prepared to send Senator Roblin a reply immediately, and to table the document for any other senator who may wish to receive a copy of it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That will be satisfactory.

Senator Olson then tabled:

Copies of document respecting federal support of fire-fighting operations in Western Canada and Northern Ontario, being a reply to Senator Roblin's question of June 5, 1980. (English text).

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PAYMENT FOR PROTEIN-TESTING EQUIPMENT

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question. This was a question by Senator Bielish with regard to protein-testing equipment. The reply is as follows.

Since August 1, 1979, the Canadian Wheat Board has contributed a protein selection allowance of 75 cents per tonne for all wheat binned at terminal position as No. 1 CW Red Spring 13.5 per cent protein. The money is credited to a special protein fund from which grain companies may draw in proportion to their terminal unloads of high protein wheat. Money from the fund is available to the companies for the purchase of protein-testing equipment and for training and other expenditures necessary to develop protein-testing systems for country elevators. Payment of the protein selection allowance by the Canadian Wheat Board will terminate at the end of this crop year, July 31, 1980. Grain companies will be able to draw from the fund up to their respective limits until August 1, 1981. Up to May 31, 1980, a total of approximately $2 million had been credited to the protein fund.

ENERGY

OIL—CONSERVATION MEASURES

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Sherwood on May 28. The Government of Canada is interested in developing alternative sources of energy to replace and/or supplement conventional fossil fuels. Ethanol, or gasohol, produced from the fermentation of agricultural crops is just one of a number of possible energy alternatives that the government is currently investigating.

Some months ago an interdepartmental task force on alcohol fuels was set up by the government to look at the technology, the economics and the implications of using alcohol as an energy source in Canada. This task force is composed of representatives from the following departments and agencies of government: Energy, Mines and Resources; Agriculture Canada; Industry, Trade and Commerce; Revenue Canada; Transport Canada; and the National Research Council. This interdepartmental group recently released its first report entitled "Discussion Paper on Alcohol Fuels from Agriculture". A second report is expected in the not too distant future.

CANADA

DISPLAY OF FOREIGN FLAGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senators Bosa and Williams on May 16 dealing with the protocol respecting the display in Canada of a flag or symbol of another country, and why the law governing the flying of the Canadian flag in Canada differs from the marine law respecting the flying of flags on ships in Canadian waters.

Following contact with the state protocol division of the Secretary of State, I have been informed that the general rules for flying and displaying the Canadian flag and other flags in Canada were adopted by cabinet in 1966. Those rules are followed in the case of federal buildings, ships and other official places. However, a private individual is free to fly any flag he or she wishes. The rules involving the flying of the flag serve, therefore, only as guidelines for private individuals, but in no way do they carry the weight of the law. The rules are the same for the flying of flags both on Canadian land and in Canadian waters.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I ask for leave to table a document entitled "General rules for flying and displaying the Canadian flag and other flags in Canada."

[English]

This is a bilingual document issued by the Secretary of State. I seek leave to table it. It provides more detail than I have given in my reply.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith then tabled:

Document entitled "General rules for flying and displaying the Canadian Flag and other flags in Canada" issued by the Department of the Secretary of State, being in reply to Senator Williams' question of May 16, 1980.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO AND MIRABEL AIRPORTS—INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Smith (Colchester) on May 29, 1980. The honourable senator asked whether airlines had withdrawn from Mirabel Airport and whether the government was considering providing additional rights at Toronto International Airport.

In May, 1976, the Minister of Transport, with cabinet agreement, announced a moratorium on further access to Toronto by carriers from other countries until additional airport facilities became available for the Toronto region. The moratorium was to remain in effect until 1980 when a review of the situation was to be undertaken. That is now being done. The review might lead to an easing of the moratorium under certain conditions.

Aer Lingus, Ireland, has suspended, and SAS, serving Denmark, Norway,and Sweden, will be suspending in July service to Mirabel, ostensibly because they have not been given access to Toronto because of the moratorium. Olympic Airlines, Greece, suspended service to Mirabel some time ago for entirely different reasons. The airlines which have suspended, or will suspend, service to Mirabel did not ask for gateways in Canada other than Toronto.

Certain other airlines, such as Iberia, Spain, and TAP, Portugal, have indicated a desire for entry into Toronto. However, at the present time we have no indication that they are contemplating suspending service to Montreal.

As many honourable senators may know, a study is currently under way concerning appropriate short and long-term roles for Mirabel and Dorval Airports in the Montreal airports system. The results of this study should be available late this year.

Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to several more questions, but in view of the hour and the fact that some senators who asked the questions are not in their place, I shall delay giving the answers until tomorrow.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CONSTITUTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider and report upon constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and upon the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

That the membership of the committee be increased to thirty members and that rule 67(1)(j) be suspended in relation to membership of the committee;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the first paragraph of the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "upon" in the second line and substituting the following therefor:—

"the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights".—(Honourable Senator Tremblay).

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I ask you not to be overly worried if we come so late to the first item on our agenda. My remarks about the amendment proposed by Senator Flynn will be as brief as possible, considering the importance of that matter.

The first question that we should ask ourselves, I think, about the amendment is what it retains of the main motion and what it changes in it. It maintains the reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs of some constitutional questions so that the committee may study them and report to the Senate. Neither the amendment nor the main motion mention a subcommittee or a special committee. So there is no discrepancy there.

What the amendment does change in the main motion is the content of the terms of reference of the standing committee.

According to the main motion, that committee would only consider:

—constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and . . . the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism.

I notice in passing that the expression "and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism" is not perfectly clear. To what does it refer exactly? Does it refer to everything that comes before in the sentence, individual and collective rights and the Senate or only to the Senate? Or has it a wider meaning, as there is a comma in the French text before the expression "and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism.

Senator Lamontagne will probably give us a further explanation about this. However, according to the explanation he already gave last week, I take for granted that his motion tries in fact to limit the terms of reference of the committee to those two subjects: individual and collective rights and the role and composition of the Senate.

Senator Lamontagne: There are three subjects, not just two.

Senator Tremblay: The Senate is one subject considered in two aspects. I do not object to counting each aspect as a subject, but as the mandate refers to the Senate I consider it as the main subject.

Senator Asselin: If you accept a third subject, you can also accept a fourth one.

Senator Tremblay: On the contrary, the amendment of Senator Flynn aims, first of all, at extending this mandate to constitutional reform as a whole. He then suggests that, according to the text of his motion, special attention be given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights.

In his intervention last week, Senator Lamontagne explained the procedure which would be followed if his motion were accepted. I have taken special note of the following part of his explanation:

> —the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would form a subcommittee to carry out its mandate described in the motion. The subcommittee, once it would have completed its work, would give its findings to the committee, which would report to the Senate through its chairman, Honourable Senator Goldenberg.
> This procedure seems totally acceptable—

> —in view of the restricted nature of the mandate, and now I am speaking of the amendment. This mandate in the motion is viewed as a preliminary step to be followed by a more extensive study of Canadian federalism.

In his view and in his approach to the eventual work of the committee, there is no opposition in principle to enlarging the mandate of the committee so that it may study the constitutional issue as a whole. Therefore, he should have no objection in principle to what the amendment suggests since it aims at such an enlargement of the mandate.

All things considered, I am wondering if, finally, the gap between the ultimate intentions of Senator Lamontagne and what he has in fact written in his resolution would not come from some confusion between the mandate and the work program of the committee, a confusion which effectively transforms into a mandate part of the complete work program that the senator is considering instead of defining the issue of the work program or rather of the work schedule within the extension of a mandate which would include all phases. This question of the work program is in fact mentioned both in the amendment and in the main motion, but quite differently.

In the main motion, it is to limit the mandate; in the amendment, it is to give the work program its proper place within a comprehensive mandate from which we must set priorities and therefore determine the work schedule.

As for the mandate to be given to the committee, it seems to me that the text of the resolution that we shall pass must be clear; that it must state categorically the way we see our role in the process of constitutional reform and the aspects of this reform which correspond to this role. It must indicate that we are interested in and are concerned with all aspects and all dimensions of the constitutional issue. It must indicate so now, at the outset, at the very time when we are taking our first institutional action in the new context of the constitutional reform.

This is, I think, a matter of principle that involves not only the objective scope and extent of our work but also how we will be perceived outside these walls.

The problem is not, as the issue was raised a bit the other day, whether we have any particular technical competence to consider given aspects of the reform, and whether we should be sticking to those aspects. It has to do with our institutional competence. In that respect, we have full competence, full and total competence. Those we represent would be the first to blame us, and rightly so, if we limited the exercise of that competence too narrowly.

That is why I think the terms of reference we are giving the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs could be extended to the whole issue of the constitutional reform, as Senator Flynn suggests in his amendment.

As to the working program of the committee and the priorities it could and should set in the consideration of specific issues, it goes without saying that we can give it certain indications in the motion we will be passing. Those indications should not, however, be overly restrictive. I think the committee should have enough latitude in that respect.

Two criteria could be used in determining the order of priorities to be set or suggestions we could make to the committee in the wording of the motion itself. The first criterion is the relative importance that we, the committee, attach to the various themes that make up the constitutional issue; the second criterion, which I think is extremely important, is the context created by those who have the initiative of the operations in the circumstances, the first ministers, who started yesterday the process of constitutional reform and whose work was precisely the subject of several questions that were put during Question Period today in this house.

We undoubtedly can and are free to make our own judgment on what is more important or less important in the reform to be made, and set our priorities on that sole criterion. However, nobody will understand, except ourselves, why we are ignoring the priorities that the first ministers' conference gave itself, as well as the aspects to be dealt with and the work schedule it set out for itself. It seems we have no choice in that.

Presumably the September conference will lead to agreements on a good number, if not all subject matters which appear on the list tabled in the Commons this afternoon by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. So, we would have to form in our minds relatively clear ideas on all those questions in a very short period of time. We should also make our views known on these matters in some way or other before the die is cast; otherwise, we will be confronted in the performance of our institutional function with the dilemma I was referring to the other day.

I find that at least six of the themes on the premiers' list deal with the distribution of powers: ownership of resources, interprovincial trade, offshore resources, fisheries, powers dealing with the economy, communications including broadcasting, family law. Six out of 12. Did I skip fisheries? I said: "Les pêches," because it is so referred to in the text.

With a view to supplying us with a work schedule and taking part at the right time in the current constitutional reform process, I find the amendment put forward by Senator Flynn to be better suited to current conditions than the main motion.

Honourable senators, such are the considerations that lead me to support Senator Flynn's amendment. Certainly the amendment is not contrary to the true intent of the main motion, but it places things in the perspective that should be ours, that of this house as a component of the Canadian Parliament.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

APPENDIX

(See p. 426.)

(As distributed at the Press Conference, June 9, 1980)

SUGGESTED AGENDA FOR THE MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS ON THE CONSTITUTION OTTAWA, JUNE 9, 1980

1. Review of developments since the Constitutional Conference of February 1979.

2. Principles for a New Canadian Constitution.

3. The Process for achieving a new Constitution including:
(a) the subjects to be given priority consideration;
(b) the arrangements for federal-provincial meetings and other work over the coming months.

CALENDAR FOR FUTURE MEETINGS OF FIRST MINISTERS AND MINISTERS ON THE CONSTITUTION PROPOSED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

(a) June 17: An organizational meeting of Ministers would be held in Ottawa or at some other convenient location. At that time a schedule for consideration of particular items during the summer months would be worked out and agreed upon.

(b) June 18 to July 6: Governments would prepare for intensive discussions.

(c) July 7 to July 25: Federal and Provincial Ministers and officials would remain in continuous session (except for weekends) for 3 weeks, and provision would be made to continue for an additional week if necessary.

(d) July 26 to August 24: Break in negotiations to allow governments to consider or reconsider positions and to prepare for further intensive discussions. The Provincial Premiers meet in Winnipeg on August 21 and 22.

(e) August 25 to August 29: Federal and Provincial Ministers and officials meet again in continuous session.

(f) August 30 to September 7: Governments consider positions and prepare for First Ministers Conference.

(g) September 8 to 12: First Ministers Conference in Ottawa to reach conclusions on work under way, and to put in train a further work program.

PRIORITIES FOR NEW CANADIAN CONSTITUTION PROPOSED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA ON JUNE 9, 1980

The time has come for the Government of Canada and the Governments of the Provinces to join together in the task of drafting a New Canadian Constitution.

As it enters upon that task, the Government of Canada is dedicated to a full review of all constitutional measures now applying to our federation.

The whole task constitutes a great enterprise and will take time to achieve. Not all of it can be accomplished at once, nor can we wait until all of it is done to demonstrate to the people of Canada that tangible progress is being made.

The Government of Canada believes, therefore, that intensive work should now begin on a list of items of particular priority to the people of Canada and to governments, with the understanding that some or all of these could well become the subject of early adoption as parts of the New Canadian Constitution.

The list of proposed items is this:

Package for the People
(Principles, Rights and Patriation)
- A Statement of Principles
- A Charter of Rights, including language rights
- A dedication to Sharing: the reduction of regional disparities
- The Patriation of the Constitution

Package on Government Powers and Institutions
- Resource Ownership and Interprovincial Trade
- Offshore Resources
- Powers affecting the Economy
- Communications, including broadcasting
- Family Law
- A new Upper House, involving the provinces
- The Supreme Court, for the people and for governments
- Fisheries

The Government also proposes that the leadership of the native peoples continue to be involved in the discussion of constitutional changes which directly affect the native peoples, in the context of the joint work on the item "Canada's Native Peoples and the Constitution". In addition, governments would pay special heed to representations from them on the items in the Packages set out above.

June 6, 1980

A STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES FOR A NEW CONSTITUTION

We, the people of Canada, proudly proclaim that we are and shall always be, with the help of God, a free and self-governing people.

Born of a meeting of the English and French presence on North American soil which had long been the home of our native peoples, and enriched by the contribution of millions of new Canadians from the four corners of the earth, we have chosen to create a life together which transcends the differences of blood relationships, language and religion, and willingly accept the experience of sharing our wealth and cultures, while respecting our diversity.

We have chosen to live together in one sovereign country, a true federation, conceived as a constitutional monarchy and founded on democratic principles.

Faithful to our history, and united by a common desire to give new life and strength to our federation, we are resolved to create together a new Constitution which:

shall be conceived and adopted in Canada,

shall reaffirm the official status of the French and English languages in Canada, and the diversity of cultures within Canadian society, shall enshrine our fundamental freedoms, our basic civil, human and language rights, including the right to be educated in one's language, French or English, where numbers warrant, and the rights of our native peoples, and shall define the authority of Parliament and of the Legislative Assemblies of our several Provinces.

We further declare that our Parliament and provincial legislatures, our various governments and their agencies shall have no other purpose than to strive for the happiness and fulfillment of each and all of us.

THE SENATE

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. William J. Petten, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

Wednesday, June 11, 1980

The Committee of Selection appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several select committees during the present session makes its second report as follows:

Pursuant to the motion adopted in the Senate on Wednesday, May 14, 1980, increasing the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to twenty-eight members, your committee has the honour to submit the list of additional senators nominated by it to serve on the said committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Hicks, Langlois, Marshall, Molgat, Molson, Roblin, Smith (Colchester) and Stanbury.

Your committee also has the honour to submit herewith the list of senators nominated by it to serve on the Special Joint Committee to study Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Cottreau, Frith, Guay, Murray and Wood.

Respectfully submitted,

William J. Petten,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SENATE MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE TO COMMONS

Hon. William J. Petten moved:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house that the Honourable Senators Asselin, Cottreau, Frith, Guay, Murray and Wood have been appointed to act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee to study Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Motion agreed to.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and before the Question Period is called, I wonder if I might draw to the attention of honourable senators the presence of some very distinguished guests in the gallery. They are members of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee, elected from eleven regions in the prairie provinces by their fellow farmers and fellow producers.

They have come to Ottawa at my invitation to meet with the Grains Group, and with members of the government. I must say that this is a first; this is the first time the Wheat Board Advisory Committee, representatives of the producers, have been invited to Ottawa to exercise their role in an official capacity. I am sure I express the wishes of all members on both sides of the house when I say that we are delighted and honoured to have them in our gallery this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I say that on this side we echo the words of the Honourable the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

When I looked at the gallery a few moments ago I noticed our former colleague, Senator Forsey, sitting next to the members of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee. It occurred to me to wonder if he is a member of that body and where he ever found the time to become an expert on wheat. In any event, I add my welcome to that of the other side.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as a senator from Saskatchewan I should like to add a word of welcome to the distinguished agricultural experts who are visiting us today. I always like to remind members of the house that these men really represent a great part of the backbone of the economy of this country. It always seems a miracle to me that we can plant these tiny seeds and bring out literally millions of dollars worth of new wealth for this country. We do not destroy a forest; we do not deplete a mine; we do not use up an oil well; we have a resource that keeps producing new wealth for the country. These are the men who do it. I hope that we recognize the fact that they make this significant contribution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

LORD SMITH, ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to call your attention to the presence in the visitors gallery of the very distinguished visitor, Lord Smith, Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons. I should also like you to welcome the person who is accompanying him, our former colleague, the Honourable Eugene Forsey.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: May I just add, Mr. Speaker, that on Thursday of last week I attended in the gallery of the House of Lords at Westminster. I do not believe his lordship was in the house at that time.

PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION FROM THE ISLE OF MAN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am delighted to inform you that we have a delegation here from the Isle of Man Parliament, with whom some of us had the pleasure of having lunch. I am pleased to welcome them and tell them that we are happy to have them with us this afternoon.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I mentioned to the Leader of the Government a few moments ago that it was the view of the official opposition that we might forego the Question Period today, should the Senate feel that it could this afternoon dispose of Senator Lamontagne's motion and the amendment moved by me to that motion. My present understanding is that Senator Frith, who moved the adjournment, is not prepared to proceed. The reason for the suggestion was that we thought it was considered urgent to dispose of this subject in view of the deadline set by the Prime Minister with regard to constitutional review. If Senator Frith is not prepared to proceed, we can use the Question Period, as we normally do.

● (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the matter does stand in my name, as has been pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition. We appreciate his suggestion, and I am not at all critical of it; but in the context of our preparedness on this side to proceed with the debate on that amendment, we are unable to accede to that request. We hope to proceed with that matter in due course tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Fine. I suppose, under the circumstances, the debate can be prolonged into next week. If there is no rush today, there will be no rush tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I did not say that.

Senator Flynn: You may not have, but that is my interpretation.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ASPECTS OF SENATE STUDY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which will be preparatory to the continuation of the debate. Can he tell us at what point in the discussions aimed at developing a new Canadian Constitution, the subjects of immigration, cultural policy and social affairs will come up for consideration? Do they form part of a second list of items to be discussed after September, or before?

I understand that the Leader of the Government does not want the Senate to discuss anything else but the reform of the Senate or a new Senate, and the entrenchment in the Constitution of our individual and collective rights including linguistic rights. When shall we discuss all the other matters?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice. Certainly the subjects mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition were not inscribed on the list of subjects which are to be given priority attention between now and September. The information requested by Senator Flynn may be available; certainly an attempt will be made to secure it.

I wish to make it clear, honourable senators, that there is no attempt on the part of the government to circumscribe efforts by honourable senators to investigate other aspects of constitutional reform. What we are discussing, however, in the resolution before the Senate is whether or not one specific aspect of constitutional change and reform—namely, change affecting the second chamber of Parliament—shall be studied by a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. That does not preclude the possibility of studies in other directions, at some point.

Senator Flynn: I would ask the Leader of the Government, if we are not circumscribing efforts to investigate other aspects of constitutional reform, why he opposed the amendment that I proposed yesterday?

Senator Perrault: I hope to speak to that amendment, as I said yesterday. I reiterate what I have just said, that before the September deadline I am certain there will be other opportunities for honourable senators and Senate committees to study more fully the list of items, and perhaps items that are not on the proposed priority list.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is the Leader of the Government trying to tell us that he will accept our amendment?

Senator Flynn: Or another one?

Senator Asselin: Or another one for the same purpose? If he decides to accept our amendment, the debate is over. Why wait until tomorrow to agree to the motion?

Senator Flynn: Or until next week?

● (1415)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, this question has been asked many times in the Senate chamber. It is not for me to impugn the opposition, but I do want to assure honourable senators once again that it may well be that a committee of the Senate will wish to study other aspects of the so-called constitutional "package." However, there could be great merit in the Senate investigating, as one of its priorities, the very future of this chamber of Parliament.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The government leader is still not answering questions. I am simply asking him: does he intend to accept the amendment proposed by the official opposition? If so, I have prepared a speech, but I will put it aside and work on something else until the matter is settled. Does he answer yes or no that tomorrow, if he speaks for the government, or if Senator Frith speaks for the government, he will tell us that he accepts our amendment?

[English]

Senator Perrault: As I stated yesterday, my present inclination is not to accept the amendment.

Senator Frith: Since I was referred to in the question I can answer it very quickly. My answer is, "No."

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Therefore, if the government leader says, "No, we will not accept your amendment," he cannot add that he will favour other discussions on constitutional matters because the amendment proposed by the opposition is the very basis for constitutional review.

So if he decides not to accept our amendment, this means that the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will not study anything other than the content of Senator Lamontagne's motion.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Naturally, in the course of the debate, the Leader of the Government could be persuaded to follow some other course of action. Let me say, however, that various options are now being considered actively by government supporters. Certain courses of action would facilitate the work of honourable senators and might broaden it to include other items.

At the present time we are considering a resolution sponsored by Senator Lamontagne, a resolution which most of us believe to be of great merit and deserving of support. Support of the motion does not rule out the possibility of later Senate consideration of other aspects of constitutional change.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Does that mean that the leader, on behalf of the government he represents, will never accept the excellent suggestions made by the official opposition, as has been his wont in the past? Give me one example of a suggestion which was made by the official opposition and accepted by your government. There have not been any. For our part, during the last session, we have accepted suggestions made by the official opposition in the other place. But you, because of your obstinacy—I know the government leader and I know he will never accept a suggestion from the official opposition simply because it does not come from his government. The party line is deeply ingrained in him.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: The question?

Senator Asselin: That is the question. I have asked it.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have difficulty in discerning whether or not there was a question implicit in that long statement just made by Senator Asselin; but for him to ascribe less than worthy motives to the government, I think, is unfair. The government supporters here have been very supportive of and open to suggestions made by the opposition. I would remind honourable senators that this debate has not yet been completed, and it may well be that those who serve in the opposition will be persuaded, before this debate is over, to support the government's view in this matter.

Senator Asselin: You did not receive such instructions from your boss.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: A supplementary question. I hope the Leader of the Government will think it is a real question.

If I have understood correctly, he has alluded to reflections which are currently being made by his colleagues according to which the substance of the intent of the amendment moved by Senator Flynn will finally be accepted, albeit under another form maybe, but accepted nonetheless by the other side of the house. Did I understand correctly that this was the gist of some of his remarks a little while ago? I expect it was.

Here is my question: When are the government leader and his colleagues going to get their act together on this? It seems to me that in view of the work schedule and the Prime Minister's insistence, which is loudly echoed by the premiers of the rest of Canada, we should deal with this matter of constitutional reform with despatch. He even mentioned "deadlines". It seems to me that if we in the Senate take too long to get our act together in matters such as these, if we take too long to get to work, we are not respecting the wishes of the first ministers. We might also be adding substance to some aspects of the reputation we have been given.

Senator Lamontagne: You are right; that is true.

● (1420)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a good deal of time has been spent by the opposition in this chamber in the process of, in effect, debating the motion on the amendment. If the honourable senator is accusing government supporters in this chamber of an unconscionable delay in the process of studying constitutional change, let me remind the opposition that they insisted upon advancing an amendment to an excellent resolution which could have been passed by now and be under discussion in committee. Of course, it is their perfect right to propose amendments, but, in light of that, to blame the government for the resultant delay is a rather remarkable accusation.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary. In such a case I do not understand why the other side is considering accepting the substance of the amendment. Either they refuse it unequivocally or else they wonder about the possibility of accepting it. Therefore, we did not cause any unconscionable delay by suggesting this improvement to the main motion since the other side is considering agreeing to it.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as you know, we have discussed this at great length. The government supporters in this chamber are fair and open-minded. We are seeking ways whereby the Senate shall be able to make as constructive a contribution as possible to this constitutional dialogue and debate. We believe there is, however, as far as honourable senators are concerned, a list of priorities.

Honourable senators know more about the second chamber than any other group of Canadians anywhere. It seems to me that this matter of the future of the second chamber, the Senate, should be given some priority, and that is the nature of the resolution advanced by Senator Lamontagne. It does not rule out the possibility of further Senate consideration of constitutional change, perhaps by authorizing the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution to complete its report. There could be other routes, involving the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Surely, honourable senators, as reasonable representatives of their regions, can understand the resolution advanced by Senator Lamontagne, which establishes certain priorities of great importance to the future of this chamber and of this country.

Senator Flynn: The future of the country is more important than the future of this chamber.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in view of his comments. I would observe that it does not strike me that the future of the Senate is at the core of our constitutional problems. Therefore, it does not strike me that it should be a matter of priority in constitutional reform to which people should be addressing themselves.

● (1425)

In any event, in view of the comments made by the Leader of the Government about the select committee of the Senate that considered constitutional matters, including the Senate, in the Parliament that ended in March, 1979, is that report going to be completed and made available to whatever body may be selected to study this motion or any similar motion that may pass the Senate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is one of the options that I would be pleased to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition. We should work in common cause here. Regardless of party affiliation, as Canadians we should interest ourselves in giving new meaning and vibrancy to Confederation and to the Constitution. Of course, the future of this country is more important than any institutions, including the Senate, which happen to be part of the constitutional process. I advance a view—which I know is shared by many honourable senators—that because of the knowledge that honourable senators possess of the second chamber, there is certain expertise which we are in a unique position to provide to the nation. That does not exclude the contribution of Senate expertise in other constitutional directions. Indeed, implicit in the Lamontagne resolution are the possibilities of consideration of other matters, and honourable senators are aware of that fact.

Senator Smith (Colchester): With respect to the select committee of the Senate, which worked so long and which was supposed to—and I believe did—constitute a fair sample of the wisdom which reposes in the Senate, does the leader not consider the report and work of that committee to be useful instruments to assist in further study?

Senator Perrault: I know that Senator Smith has great confidence in his leader. I would like to meet with his leader to discuss possible options and courses of action for the Senate with respect to the constitutional dialogue and debate. I do not think there is much ultimate value in prolonging at this particular time a discussion about which courses of action may be available. There are a number of courses of action which are available.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Of course I have great confidence in my leader. I will not comment on the confidence I have in certain other honourable gentlemen who are conspicuous in this discussion, but I would ask the Leader of the Government again if he would care to direct his attention to the question I asked, namely, is he prepared to see that the select committee, to which I referred, has an opportunity to place its report before the Senate which, in turn, could place it before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, if that committee is the one to study this motion?

Senator Perrault: Yes, that is a distinct possibility.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Leader of the Government has indicated that he might change his mind and yield to some extent to meet the wishes of the official opposition, would the deputy leader reconsider his firm and negative answer to any possibility of changing his attitude and that of the mover of the motion?

It seems to me that the deputy leader, by saying no at this time and before he has had a chance to discuss this matter with the Leader of the Government, was not sure what reasons he had to oppose the amendment. He was sure what stand he would take but he was trying to find reasons to say no. Now that the leader has cut the grass from under his feet I suppose he would be prepared to change his attitude.

• (1430)

Senator Frith: The question was whether it was my intention to support the amendment. My answer was no.

Senator Flynn: But you were not prepared to proceed this afternoon, so you were looking for reasons to say no.

Senator Asselin: It would have been easy to say no this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: I suppose the conciliatory attitude of the Leader of the Government must have weakened his stand.

Senator Frith: My intention at the present time and my intention at the time of the question with reference to the amendment has not changed at all.

Senator Flynn: You are as stubborn as Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Frith: I am honoured to be so associated.

Senator Flynn: You can have it.

LABOUR

RESTRICTIVE PROVINCIAL EMPLOYMENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government, in view of the fact that the Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission criticized as unacceptable narrow provincialism legislation of the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia governments restricting jobs in certain fields to local residents, what has been the reaction of the federal government to such unfair laws?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I will take that question as notice.

Senator Haidasz: In view of the violation of fundamental rights of Canadians by such legislation, is it the intention of the federal government to include freedom of movement and equal employment opportunity rights in the Charter of Rights that is being proposed as an essential part of a new Canadian Constitution?

Senator Perrault: I will take that question as notice.

Hon. Robert Muir: Are Nova Scotia and Newfoundland the only two provinces that have done something along these lines? When the Leader of the Government answers would he reply accordingly?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Two-thirds of labour-management relations are under provincial jurisdiction in this country, and I think this is very dangerous landmined territory for a federal person to walk under present circumstances. As I said, I will take the question as notice. I make no accusation against any level of government.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PORT HAWKESBURY AND GLACE BAY—REPORTED SHUTDOWN OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Can the Minister of State for Economic Development confirm the story by Jeff Carruthers in today's Globe and Mail that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is considering "rationalizing" its production of heavy water by mothballing its Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay heavy water plants?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my staff anticipated that this question would be asked today. The answer is as follows: The 1980-81 main estimates for AECL provide an amount of $110 million for heavy water inventory costs. This amount, which covers the heavy water production costs from AECL's heavy water plants at Glace Bay and Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia, is recoverable upon sale of the product.

Canada is not at this time in a situation of surplus heavy water supply; all existing supplies are allocated to reactors now under construction. Continued lower offshore sales could produce a surplus situation in time. However, it takes one year of heavy water from AECL's plant to supply a single 600 megawatt Candu reactor. AECL is continuing to pursue actively further reactor sales, both domestic and offshore, which would absorb future heavy water production.

AECL is analyzing various long-range scenarios for heavy water production which recognize future sales estimates. There are no existing plans, however, to shutdown or to cut back the operating plants in Nova Scotia, both of which have achieved in the past year record levels of production.

Senator Muir: I wish to thank the minister for having his music with him. His answer was very encouraging, and we can take from that that there are definitely no thoughts whatsoever of cutting back, laying off or reducing operations at both these heavy water plants, particularly in view of the fact that AECL is budgeting, as I understand it, a total of $15.3 million this year for capital expenditures for both of these plants. Is that correct?

Senator Olson: I should tell my honourable friend that I am not going to make announcements on behalf of the ministers who are directly charged with this responsibility. I really must stand on the answer that was given. As he said, I had my music with me, so obviously the answer was prepared.

The fact is that the production of heavy water to date is committed and will not go into a surplus stockpile, if you wish to call it that. Therefore, the question is whether more heavy water ought to be manufactured on the basis of prospective sales. That decision will be made sometime in the future, and I am not sure how much sooner or how much later. I want you to understand the accuracy of the situation now, and that it could change rapidly if sales of new plants come to fruition or materialize. As I said, that may change quickly. I am not sure how many days' production are required to take care of the committed requirements. It may be a few days, or it may be quite a number, but the accuracy of the situation is that there has not been any manufactured to date that is destined to go to a surplus stockpile.

Senator Muir: I thank the minister for his further reply. I shall only be too glad to give him all the time required to discuss with his colleagues the future of these two plants.

By way of a supplementary question, I wonder if he would consider, along with his colleagues, directing AECL on behalf of the government not to close its Nova Scotia plants, so that no one will be able to accuse this government of creating employment in Altantic Canada by giving assistance to Michelin, and reiterating commitments to Sysco, as did the Leader of the Government yesterday, and then creating unemployment on the other hand by closing the heavy water plants.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the contradictions that come along all sound great. Even though all these plants are located in the same part of Canada, whether or not there are further sales of reactors, necessitating more heavy water, really stands by itself. That is not dependent on whether there are markets for steel or justification for renovating the Sysco plant, nor, indeed, is either one of those dependent on whether or not there is a projected viable market for Michelin tires.

So I hope the honourable senator is not trying to confuse that. If we are selling tires, that does not necessarily mean that we will continue to produce heavy water.

Senator Muir: Far be it from me to try to confuse the very intelligent and capable minister, whom I served with in the other place. I would never attempt to do that. However, I do detect a note of pessimism. If he is suggesting to us that the government cannot direct a crown corporation to do certain things and that the government has a policy of non-interference with the activities of crown corporations, I would remind him that the government decided to move the new Eldorado plant from the riding of the Honourable Allan Lawrence to a Liberal riding in northern Ontario at a cost to the Canadian taxpayer of $60 million, and this despite the fact that the Eldorado Board of Directors had unanimously advised that the new plant be located in Port Hope.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if I may modify slightly the comment of the honourable senator respecting the location of the uranium refinery, it is a fact that the Liberal Party announced before the election took place that it was one of our policies to move processing plants as close to the source of the raw material as is practical. So the honourable senator should take that into account when he discusses the movement of the Eldorado plant.

Senator Flynn: Very practical.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO TAIWAN

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, can the Minister of State for Economic Development inform the Senate as to whether or not any negotiations are now taking place with the Government of Taiwan in respect of the purchase of a reactor? The Government of Taiwan, at one period of time, was very anxious to purchase reactors.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice. I shall have to make some inquiries as to whether active negotiations are under way specifically with Taiwan.

GRAIN

REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF WHEAT EXPORTING COUNTRIES HELD IN BRUSSELS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some questions for the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Recently, a meeting of the wheat exporting countries was held in Brussels, and the report of that meeting I have in my hand indicates that the Canadian Wheat Board was not represented. My first question for the minister is whether there was any representation on behalf of the Government of Canada at that meeting.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Canada was represented at that meeting by Mr. W. M. Miner, the Co-ordinator of the Grains Group. Mr. Miner has led the Canadian delegations now for some years and has been our chief negotiator in international negotiations respecting wheat.

Senator Roblin: Is there any reason why the Canadian Wheat Board was not represented at that meeting?

Senator Argue: It was felt that the representation by Mr. Miner was quite adequate for Canada. Mr. Miner, in a sense, is my deputy minister. As a Minister of State with no department as such, I do not have a deputy minister, but Mr. Miner is head of the Grains Group. He has headed Canadian delegations on previous occasions in negotiating international wheat agreements. So, to my mind, this was a satisfactory arrangement for Canada.

Senator Roblin: While I recognize Mr. Miner's competency in this field, I would have been happier had the Canadian Wheat Board, since it is concerned as a seller of wheat, been represented directly at that meeting. It seems to me that at meetings of grain exporting nations, the agency responsible for Canada's export effort should be in attendance. However, I shall allow the minister to deal with that matter at his leisure.

WHEAT SALES TO THE U.S.S.R.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to go on and deal with the general topic of wheat exports. Reports dealing with the wheat embargo that the U.S. put into place recently indicate that some developments have been taking place which do not seem to be advantageous to this country. While I have no means of confirming these reports, there are indications that both the United States and Australia are currently in the position of having set records in terms of wheat sales to Russia, whereas the same cannot be said of Canada.

The minister made a statement to the press in respect of this matter of the embargo and our wheat export position—

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): When was that?

Senator Roblin: The press release is dated January 9, 1980. It is not a recent one, but it evidently indicates his position in respect of this matter.

Senator Argue: What was the date, again?

Senator Roblin: January 9, 1980.

Senator Argue: What was my capacity then?

Senator Roblin: That was when the minister had the delightful luxury of reposing on the benches of the opposition. It may be that between then and now there has been some sea change that has altered my honourable friend's views, and I think I should explore that matter to find out where he stands these days.

The minister stated at that time that he felt that the grain producers needed more help with the price of wheat. That was one of the things he said in that statement, and certainly we would agree with that. As a matter of fact, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, on January 11 last year, when he was Prime Minister, indicated that Canadian producers would be compensated for losses arising out of the American embargo policy espoused by the government.

Since there has been a fall in the price of wheat since then, of about 75 cents a bushel—which, to some extent at any rate, must be linked to the embargo situation—may I ask my honourable friend whether he has decided to follow through with his sound opinion of January 9 last to provide some financial assistance to the wheat farmers in respect of their sacrifices owing to the American embargo?

Senator Argue: I thank Senator Roblin for his series of questions. I may have to make something of a speech in my endeavour to cover the territory that he has examined. I do not know the context of my January 9 speech, and I really do not need to get into that—

Senator Roblin: It was a good speech.

Senator Argue: I would hope it was. I have taken the attitude over the years—and I take the same attitude now—that there should be developed amongst the wheat exporting countries of the world a real solid measure of exporter co-operation. That was my opinion on January 9, and I am more firm in that belief today, if that is possible, than I was even at that time, because I think recent events have shown that exporter co-operation is fundamentally necessary for the welfare of the wheat producers of this country and other countries. Therefore, I am in favour of that.

I have some general statements on the so-called embargo, or partial embargo that the United States put in place and asked Canada to go along with, and I hope my statements will provide the house with some information in that respect.

It is perfectly clear that the Clark government went along with the general principle of this embargo of sales of grain to the Soviet Union. It was stated at the time by the Clark government that Canada's position should be to provide, with the embargo being in place, "normal and traditional" amounts of grain to the Soviet Union. This was defined—and this is part of the record—by Prime Minister Clark at a press conference as an amount of 3 million tonnes for Canada. I am informed—and this may not be accurate, so I do not put it forward as such—that the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mr. Clark, was not able to get through all of the advice that was given to him by the department, as a result of which he came up with a figure that was unduly low, and it was unduly low even based on the advice that he was being given at that time. So since that 3 million tonnes figure was stated publicly by the former Prime Minister, there has been a small escalation in the amount that has been exported, and I think this has been done by general agreement.

The agreed-upon quantity as of that time which Canada would export was slightly increased, but it is still considered as being in accord with the agreement that was made. It is a fact that in the present U.S. crop year, which I believe ends in June, the United States has exported the largest quantities of grain in its history, including its exports to the Soviet Union. It is also true that Australia has exported in the current crop year its largest exports of grain to the Soviet Union. It is also true that in our current crop year Canada will export to the Soviet Union something slightly less than the amount that was exported by Australia, putting us in a very definite inferior position within that market.

There is a feeling—and I don't want to put undue emphasis on this—that there has been some considerable leakage into that market and that perhaps the private grain trade of the United States is so aggressive and so efficient that grain may leak into that market. I put that forward as a debatable point, because the Canadian Wheat Board takes the stand that there has been a lot of leakage. The advice that I have been given is in this direction.

The Americans come back with the proposition, based on their own argument, that there has not been leakage or certainly there has been no substantial leakage into that market. Here I come to what I think is the crux of the question. Canada said it would be prepared to agree to normal and traditional sales to the Soviet Union, not to be aggressive or endeavour to supplant the American position in that market. Those words are all right and they sound all right, but they really do not fit the Canadian context, because over the years the normal and traditional pattern of trade with the Soviet Union has been for the Soviet Union to come to Canada as its first choice, and give us the opportunity of being the first supplier. That has been a long-established practice. The Soviet Union has bought from Canada in the last ten years grains varying greatly in amount from year to year. I think the low figure was 350,000 tonnes and the high figure was 5.4 million tonnes. Taking a three-year period from the recent past, those sales have been 4.4 million tonnes ranging to 5.4 million tonnes, or somewhere in that neighbourhood.

The Americans have not exercised a complete embargo on grain sales to the Soviet Union. They had a five-year treaty providing for eight million tonnes of American wheat to go to the Soviet Union and they said, "That is a treaty, we are not going to break it. Even though Soviet troops go into Afghanistan, we are not breaking that treaty."

As to what I think the position of the former government should have been—I suppose I am being critical but I am not trying to make any special point of it; I am trying to take a stand that is in the positive interest of Canada and the wheat producers—I think the former administration made a mistake in defining "normal and traditional" as being a somewhat optimistic arithmetic average of what we have been selling, because I don't think you can do it that way. Our tradition has been that when the Soviet Union needs wheat they come to Canada first, and if we have the wheat and the transportation facilities we have the first chance to supply it. In that normal and traditional period for normal and traditional amounts it has been around five million tonnes as the higher figure. I think that as a nation we should have stood firm in saying, "We are prepared not to go in and smash your rules and we will not try to occupy your position, in the Soviet Union, but we want to defend Canada's own trade position as being one of continued opportunity to supply normal and traditional quantities."

As to price and what has happened, it is true that the former government said that if there was a financial loss that could be directly attributable to this particular action, compensation would be considered. I believe the principle of compensation is being carried forward, although, of course, this is a new administration, a different administration. But I believe that that commitment is going forward. I have, however, taken this position, and I suppose I shall be criticized for it; I just do not think it is possible to say that the price was such and such on January 4 and it has gone down such and such and the difference is all attributable to the embargo. I personally do not have all that much faith in the so-called world price as being a price that accurately reflects at any given time the supply and demand position.

My information is that on January 4 the Wheat Board asking price was just that, an asking price. It was probably above the price for which they would have been prepared to sell grain in substantial quantities at that time. The drought, I suppose, has an effect on world markets as has the supply available generally throughout the world. Then there are interest rates. I am no commodity expert but I have read that interest rates have a tremendous effect on commodity markets. High interest rates will depress commodity markets. As I say, I am not an expert on that but it is something that should be looked at.

The price of Durum Wheat has gone up since the embargo. I can only give a guess for now, but my estimate would be, if my memory serves me right, that it has gone up probably in the neighbourhood of somewhere between $20 and $30 a tonne. I do not suppose that one could really say that the Russian embargo resulted in Durum prices going up. I don't think that would make any sense at all, but in that period of time Red Spring Wheat has definitely gone down and Durum prices have gone up.

Anyway, there are many, many factors to be considered, and certainly this whole question should be looked at. My own view is that Canada should co-operate with the United States in principle on the question of exercising restraint in dealing with the Soviet export market so that we are not endeavouring to replace in a real way or in any way the market that the Americans have wished to withdraw from, but I do feel that in light of our normal and traditional markets in that country the current arrangements are not in the best interests of our wheat producers.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend be kind enough to investigate two specific aspects of the matters he raised in his statement just now? The first is in connection with price. I quite agree with him that the establishment of a price and the factual demonstration as to what losses the farmers have suffered as a result of the embargo policy is not a question to which the answer is immediately obvious. But I think that what is concerning the people in my part of the country is this: What is the official assessment of the situation? They know of the statement by political parties that they want to save them harmless from the result of this embargo that no doubt has been undertaken for national interests. And they want to know whether there is a price variation there that ought to be taken into account. So I ask my honourable friend if he would be kind enough to put his people to work so that he can give his opinion or the government's opinion as to what that price problem really is. That is the first question.

My second question is this: What attitudes or what representations or what actions are going to be taken in dealing with people who may be, to use an inaccurate but illustrative word, cheating on the embargo? The opinion has been advanced by important sections of the grain producing community in western Canada that the United States has not played quite fair in respect to the embargo, and really has not accepted the principle that they should restrain their sales to the U.S.S.R. Although they may have done so nominally, by way of making sales to associated countries in eastern Europe they play an end-run. I think this is becoming a matter of real concern in the west. Is the embargo being approached on a fair and square basis by the three participants, namely, Canada, Australia and the United States, in respect of sharing the market, or is there an end-run being conducted?

I agree with the minister that we do want to have some co-operation in this matter. There is no argument on that. But I think it is the part of ordinary common sense to make sure that our position is equitable, all things considered.

To refer back to the question of the price again, I want to remind him that his thought on "motherhood," namely getting the four main grain producers to agree on wheat pricing, is commendable. However, he and I both know it is a difficult question and that the question which should really be addressed is whether the Canadian economy as a whole should take into account the losses, whatever they are, in the price of grain rather than relying on some indefinite agreement that is really not probable.

Senator Argue: I thank Senator Roblin for his fair and important questions. Just a moment ago he referred to the matter of exporter co-operation and alluded to my thoughts as "motherhood," whatever that means. My assessment of exporter co-operation is that up until January 4 it was being developed in a real sense and there was co-operation. Certainly, there was frequent consultation.

Senator Roblin: Lots of talk!

Senator Argue: I think, if you followed the market, it was having an effect. I see Senator Roblin shaking his head, so we differ on that point.

Senator Roblin: I only do so because of my experience of listening to the authorities in the American Department of Agriculture. The views of the leaders of the Congress were quite different from the views of the department. The department was pretty tough.

Senator Argue: In any event, I stand by what I said. There may be other arguments and there may be particular reasons why the U.S. Department of Agriculture officials are saying that. I do not know that. I do not have information on that. I think exporter co-operation has suffered because of this situation and I hope that before too many months go by we can see the kind of effort required so that exporter co-operation can be successfully achieved.

There are Canadian parliamentarians, as I am sure the Honourable Senator Roblin knows, on both sides of the House of Commons and on both sides of this chamber—certainly on both sides of this house—co-operating with American parliamentarians in an effort to achieve exporter co-operation.

I have had conversations with some distinguished members of the Conservative Party on this very question. I have not had a report yet. I am the worse for that, but I have not been able to arrange an appointment yet so that I can receive the reports of some of these important Canadian parliamentarians on recent talks they have had. It is an important matter. Senator Roblin was in on the discussions we had some time ago when we met with the Senate Agricultural Committee in the United States. He was an important and constructive member of the team that took part in those negotiations.

[Senator Roblin.]

The specific question, however, is whether I, as the minister, would either instruct them or do what I can to have officials look into the question of just how much was the real price effect. What in fact was the real price effect of the grain embargo? Although I am not the authority in charge of the studies, I can tell Senator Roblin that studies are under way in government circles and that this information is being sought and is being assembled. I just hope the officials are able to get at the actual facts.

On the question of an end run and whether or not that can be proven, what we hear Canadians say so far is, "There is a lot of leakage and here is our evidence." That is the evidence of Canadians, many of whom are not parliamentarians and are outside the scope of government. They say, "Here is our evidence as Canadians, that there is leakage and that this is not working." The Americans come back with what they say is pretty hard evidence that the embargo is being effective and is in fact hurting the Soviet economy.

All I can say is that a lot more work must be done on the Canadian side to be able, effectively, to counter those arguments from the American side. The position taken by Canadian authorities in the grain business, outside of the government circles, is that the American system lends itself to these leakages because it is a free system in which there are many sellers, whereas the Canadian Wheat Board is a single selling agency for export wheat, and all that is needed is to check with the Canadian Wheat Board to see our position. We are at somewhat of a disadvantage when we try to obtain evidence that perhaps only the Americans can provide to us. That suspicion is around and many Canadians—informed Canadians—feel sincerely that there has been and is a good deal of leakage.

WHEAT SALES TO U.S.S.R. BY THE ARGENTINE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. It has been reported to me by some of my farmer friends that the Argentine, as a major exporter of wheat, is stepping into the breach created in the supply of grain to the U.S.S.R., and has been cashing in by charging much higher prices than would normally be the case. Is the minister prepared to comment on that?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): The Argentine has officially stayed out of the arrangement. The Argentine is not in the arrangement. That is certainly public information around the world in the grain business. Although this is only an estimate, I think it is accurate to say that the Argentine has gained a good deal in terms of price by dealing directly with the Soviet Union in these circumstances. It was said to me just a few hours ago by a person who understands the grain business, but who is outside the official government circles, that the information they had was that the gain might have been as high as $50 a tonne. That would have been a high premium because of the situation.

At any rate, I will take that question as notice and check on whether I am correct in suggesting that there was a gain of $50 a tonne, because I would not want to put inaccurate information before this chamber. Certainly, the Argentine has obtained a substantial premium.

Senator Buckwold: Has the Argentine been a traditional supplier on some large scale to the U.S.S.R.? If not, might this situation result in the establishment of that market by the Argentine to the detriment of the Canadian exporters?

Senator Argue: I am not too sure how important the Argentine has been in the Soviet market in recent years or, for that matter, over the history of grain marketing. Certainly, it has been a supplier in that market. I do not think there is any major danger that the Argentine will displace Canada or the United States in that market, however, because the Argentine in relation to Canada is a fairly minor grain exporter. I think it exports about one-third the amount that Canada normally exports. In the normal context of things, I doubt that the Argentine is big enough to cause other exporters into the Soviet market any major trouble in the years ahead.

However, it is an important point and undoubtedly—and this is just a guess—in normal human relations, if the Argentine were supplying grain when the Soviet Union was in dire need, I suppose that would have to count for something. I am certainly no authority on the operations of the grain trade in that country.

INTERNATIONAL GRAIN AGREEMENT—BREAKDOWN IN TALKS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to address a supplementary question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

I understand that U.S. Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland is quoted as saying that there is a virtual breakdown in talks relating to an international wheat or grain agreement, and that as a consequence he is giving serious consideration to having the United States enter into an aggressive program of bilateral agreements with major grain importing countries.

• (1510)

I should like to ask the minister whether that type of activity by the United States would have a depressing effect on Canadian grain prices; secondly, whether he believes that Mr. Bergland is simply verbalizing part of the negotiation to bring the international wheat agreement back to a more rational course; and, thirdly, whether indeed some position has been taken in the United States with respect to renewing or not renewing the five-year agreement with the Soviet Union, which the minister mentioned a few moments ago, in view of the continued occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have not seen the statement to which the honourable senator referred as having been made by Mr. Bergland, the American Secretary of Agriculture, and therefore I am not in a position to comment on it.

Over the years, and within the past year or so, there have been discussions about the desirability of having an international wheat agreement. The old international wheat agreement broke down. At that time the attitude of Canada was that we were losing by having been a participant in that unworkable international wheat agreement. So Canada participated in the wheat agreement discussions of a few years ago in a cautious mood, feeling that some really important rules would have to be put in place, particularly as to the down-side guarantees. The Canadian government was not satisfied. In its delegation there were some of the leading farm spokesmen in Canada, and it was generally agreed among members of the delegation that on account of the way the international wheat talks were going at that time, it was not in Canada's interest to continue those talks, that nothing was being accomplished.

There may now be some warm-up towards an international wheat agreement. I sense that from conversations I have had with the Honourable Peter Nixon of Australia, who is their minister in charge of grain marketing. So another look may be given to this whole question. An international wheat agreement ideally would be the best way to go, but the path is fraught with many dangers.

I have not seen Mr. Bergland's statement, so I shall not comment on it. The evidence we have is that the Americans are being exceedingly aggressive—I do not complain about that—in many markets of the world. They are doing everything they can to compensate for the fact that they are in a partial embargo position with the Soviet Union. I do not have any information as to whether or not they are going to go forward with an extension of that five-year agreement. I would simply observe that the American presidential election is not far away and the chances are that this agreement will be looked at following that election. The honourable senator's guess might be better than mine as to who might be occupying the Oval Office in the White House to deal with this question.

Senator Austin: Could I say to the minister that I hope that in the discharge of his responsibility—and I have great confidence in him—we will not end up in a situation where the United States decides to terminate its treaty agreement with the Soviet Union and therefore seeks to replace that market by very aggressive bilateral arrangements with many other countries who are major wheat importers, including Japan, Mexico, Egypt, Poland, the Philippines and China. If that happens, we shall find that because of our moral commitments, or past commitments of either the Clark government or this government, we cannot pick up some of the slack in the Soviet market. The Americans may have their reasons. I hope that we shall be very careful to examine our own.

Senator Argue: All I can say to the honourable senator is that I believe his comments are important and I shall certainly take them into account.

WHEAT SALES TO THE U.S.S.R. BY THE ARGENTINE

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: May I ask the minister a question? If I recall him correctly, he said a few minutes ago that Argentina would sell wheat to Russia for about $50 per tonne.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Premium.

Senator Deschatelets: What was the price that Canada was charging the Russians?

Senator Argue: I cannot inform the honourable senator, because the exact price for a given sale is kept confidential by, I believe, every major grain organization in the world. I have not asked the Wheat Board for that kind of information. However, in general terms, the sales would reflect the market at the time. It could be a deal that resulted in huge sales at a shade less than the asking price for a given day. At least, that is my understanding.

In recent times the asking price for the basic grade of wheat out of Thunder Bay has been between $195 and $210 per tonne. If you add $50, they would be getting a premium of about 20 per cent. In putting forward those figures, it is just an estimate. I am not able to tell the senator precisely what the Wheat Board charges at any given time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed replies. However, they are not particularly urgent and if honourable senators on the opposition side are satisfied, I shall delay them until tomorrow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Having had a quick word with my leader, I would propose that if they are not questions of universal interest, the answers might be provided to the persons who asked the questions. If the replies are of wider interest, perhaps they could be printed and we could avoid the necessity of having to listen to them in detail.

Senator Perrault: That procedure is quite satisfactory.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SOMALIA—ASSISTANCE RESPECTING REFUGEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie on April 24 about the Canadian government's response to the plight of the refugees in Somalia.

(The answer follows:)

Somalia has not been approved as a project eligible country but does have an allocation of $25,000 annually. In the past the Mission Administered Fund allocation has not been fully utilized, mainly due to the difficulty in communication between Mogadishu and Dar es Salaam, in Tanzania, the post of accreditation. This year, however, with accreditation having been moved to Jeddah in Saudi Arabia from where communication with Mogadishu is improved, it is expected that much greater use will be made of the Mission Administered Fund allocation.

Somalia is eligible for emergency relief, and in response to major food needs occasioned by severe drought conditions, CIDA made two emergency food contributions of $2 million each in 1975 and 1976. Also the Cabinet has just approved an additional contribution of $3 million for 1980-81.

The Government of Canada is also responding to the refugee crisis in Somalia through the regular multilateral channels. For example, Canada contributes to the World Food Program (WFP), the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

PLIGHT OF IRANIAN STUDENTS ENROLLED AT AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked on May 1 by Senator Lawson regarding the plight of Iranian students enrolled at American universities.

(The answer follows:)

The five Iranian students concerned were enrolled in an architecture course at the University of Idaho. Four of these students have now left Canada to continue their studies elsewhere. The fifth student, who is married to an American citizen, has been granted a three-month extension to his visa as of May 30 so that he can remain in Canada pending the outcome of his application to the American authorities to re-enter the U.S.A.

PARLIAMENT

APPOINTMENT OF TASK FORCES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked on May 27 by Senator Marshall regarding the recently established parliamentary task forces. It is a short question and honourable senators might like to have the reply verbally.

At the present time, the parliamentary task forces report to House of Commons committees and are made up solely of members of the other place. This, of course, does not preclude the Senate from establishing task forces of its own which would report to Senate committees.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI FINAL ACT—PREPARATION FOR REVIEW CONFERENCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked on May 27 by Senator Haidasz regarding implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. That reply could be printed in the record of today's proceedings.

Senator Flynn: Senator Haidasz is here. He can speak for himself.

Senator Perrault: The reply could be dealt with in the chamber tomorrow or could be printed in our record of today's proceedings.

Senator Haidasz: I would prefer tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Very well. I will give it tomorrow in the chamber.

TRANSPORT

AIRPORTS—LANDING FEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a lengthy reply to a question asked by Senator Smith (Colchester) with respect to user and landing fees at airports owned and operated by the Ministry of Transport. The reply is rather detailed.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Perhaps that could be dealt with tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: That is perfectly satisfactory.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISHERIES—EAST COAST BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked on June 3 by Senator Marshall regarding fisheries and the east coast boundary controversy.

(The answer follows:)

Since the signature of the East Coast Fishery Treaty and the Gulf of Maine Boundary Adjudication Treaty in March 1979, the Canadian Government has consistently and repeatedly urged the U.S. Administration to take the necessary steps to ratify these treaties.

The U.S. Administration has assured us that it remains committed to the treaties as signed. There is, however, opposition to the fishery treaty in the U.S. Senate, which has deferred action to ratify and implement it and the boundary adjudication treaty to which it is linked. Canada has expressed to the U.S. government strong concern about significant increases in U.S. fishing activity in the boundary region inconsistent with the purposes of the treaties, detrimental to Canadian fishing interests. The government is actively examining available options in the event that these treaties are not given Senate consent in the very near future.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 5 Senator Doody asked a question with respect to the total impact of the postal settlement. There are two replies to that question. The Post Office officials approached their task with zeal in providing as much information as possible.

The honourable senator asked whether the same circumstances and conditions as those in the postal settlement—40 hours work in a 37½-hour week—will be applied to other people employed by the Public Service or by crown agencies.

(The answer follows:)

A key to achieving this negotiated settlement, the first without any disruptions in nearly 10 years is the recognition, as recommended by the Conciliation Board report, of the factory-like environment quite different from other groups in the Public Service, in which inside postal workers work. Theirs is also a quite different environment and job from the letter carriers.

The honourable senator also asked for the total cost of the settlement with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

(The answer follows:)

The basic wage package during the life of the contract represents an increase of 8.1 per cent.

The overall expenditure of the monetary settlement including increased shift and weekend premiums, COLA payments, and improved vacations for long-time employees represents an increase of approximately 10.4 per cent over the life of the contract.

In monetary terms, the President of the Treasury Board has set the total cost of the settlement at $36,068,232 that is inclusive of COLA, cost-of-living index adjustment and improved fringe benefits, and it is calculated on the base of a straight-time payroll plus COLA, which is $345,829,659.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-17, intituled "An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Bosa.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to introduce Bill C-17, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. The provisions contained in this bill will provide continuing government support to the very important small business sector of our national economy.

Basically, the bill makes provision for a number of changes in the act: a two-year extension of the Small Businesses Loans Act from July 1, 1980, to June 30, 1982; a new authorized lending ceiling of $850 million; and an increase in the loan limit to any single borrower from $75,000 to $100,000.

First let me provide honourable senators with some background to the act. The Small Businesses Loans Act came into being on January 19, 1961, to facilitate the entry into term lending for capital purposes of major financial institutions, and in that respect it has been successful. Since the inception of the program some 65,000 loans with a value of over $1 billion have been granted, providing financing to the small business sector which, in many cases, would not otherwise have been available.

Another major feature of the program is the lack of direct government involvement. All negotiations take place directly between the lender and the borrower, and, if the guidelines are met, the loan automatically qualifies for the government guarantee. The chartered banks have participated in the program from the beginning. More recently trust companies, credit unions, caisses populaires and the Province of Alberta treasury branches have also become qualified lenders under the act.

The program has broad national acceptance by both borrowers and lenders. Introduction of a floating interest rate of 1 per cent over the chartered banks' prime lending rate in early 1978 contributed significantly to acceptance of the SBLA by private financial institutions. Prior to that time the rate on SBLA loans was set in accordance with interest rates charged on Government of Canada securities, and frequently resulted in a return to lenders below going market rates. This change to a rate more in line with prevailing market rates has resulted in a surge in lending activity, with $256 million being lent in 1979 alone, as compared to $90 million in 1977, the year just prior to this change. Losses under the program have remained minimal, with only $1.8 million in losses for 1979, or 0.4 per cent of outstanding loans—a rate well in line with the private sector's own experience. I should reiterate that activity under this program is taking place with minimal government intervention and at very little cost for the benefits it delivers.

Honourable senators, I will now deal with the major amendments mentioned in the bill.

I would like first to bring to the attention of honourable senators one minor change with respect to lending undertaken during the lending period ending June 30, 1980. It is proposed that the financial ceiling under the present SBLA be increased from $600 million to $675 million. This is intended as a temporary measure to cover higher than anticipated lending under the act.

Secondly, a two-year extension to the act is being requested rather than the usual three. This will allow time for completion of a comprehensive policy review of the government's small businesses financing programs. The results of this review may give rise to substantive changes in the federal government's financial support programs for small entrepreneurs, and should be completed in approximately eighteen months time; hence the request for a shorter than usual extension.

Thirdly, honourable senators, the bill proposes a new loan ceiling to which the government guarantee applies. The present $600 million, in effect for the three-year period July 1, 1977 to June 30, 1980, goes to $850 million for the extended two-year period from July 1, 1980 to June 30, 1982. That this amount is considerably increased over that previously in effect, and for a shorter period, indicates the growing need for such assistance, and the government's willingness to fill these requirements.

Finally, and perhaps most important, honourable senators, is the increase in individual loan limits from $75,000 to $100,000, reflecting the demand for larger loans to cover the increased costs of capital assets which are being financed. Smaller companies are those most vulnerable to inflationary cost increases, and this program provides a measure of protection for them. In this respect, the interest rate ceiling for loans of prime plus 1 per cent is considerably better than that which would be required for similar purposes without the benefit of the guarantee.

A final minor amendment, honourable senators, reflects transfer of administration of the program from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as their mandate includes supporting and servicing the needs of small business.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, perhaps I may take just a moment to speak to Bill C-17.

Senator Bosa has very carefully covered the details of the bill, so I will take very little time. The main thrust of the bill, as Senator Bosa has said, is to increase the loan limit from $75,000 to $100,000. I understand that the last time this was changed was some three years ago, when the ceiling was raised from $50,000. It would appear that perhaps the increase that is now before us in this amendment will barely cover the inflation that has taken place during the past three years, and perhaps it is not such a significant change in actual terms to the borrowers.

The ceiling has been raised, as has the total amount available for the program, and of course this is a laudable thing. I fully expect that a great many more small business firms will be taking advantage of the program.

The interest rate of 1 per cent over prime is, of course, a very competitive rate for the small business people. The tragedy is that it is the government that has to find it necessary to supply this service to the small business community. One would think that the private sector would be capable of taking up this relatively small amount of money so that the government could perhaps find other avenues to work in. There is no doubt in my mind that it is necessary.

The private sector has not seen fit to involve itself in this sort of program, despite the fact, as Senator Bosa has pointed out, that the percentage of losses in the program has been relatively small. I think that perhaps some effort should be made to convince the chartered banks to get more active in this field, and perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance can take that up with a representative of one of the major chartered banks in the near future.

One other item which gained my attention as I skimmed through the bill, honourable senators, is the change in the ministry. The minister responsible under the original act was the Minister of Finance, and now I find that under the bill the minister responsible will be the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. To make it even more mysterious, the minister who has been given the responsibility of piloting the bill through the other place, and who has defended the bill in committee and in the house, is the Minister of State for Small Businesses. This adds to my confusion with regard to the actual lines of authority that ministers of state have in these areas. Perhaps someone can explain the difference to me. It seems strange to me that the minister charged under the act with responsibility for administering the fund is not the minister charged with the actual administration of the act. Honourable senators, I simply bring these items to your attention. I commend Senator Bosa. In my opinion there is no need to bring this bill before committee. That is all I have to say in this regard.

• (1530)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should just like to add one word to what Senator Doody has said. When listening to Senator Bosa, I was puzzled why the banks were not in this on their own when there was only a loss of 0.4 per cent. Possibly Senator Bosa could explain that to this chamber.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, my understanding is that the banks will not make such loans to small businesses unless they are guaranteed to the banks based on the security of the assets of the borrowers.

Another question was raised by Senator Doody concerning the transfer of jurisdiction for the administration of the Small Businesses Loans Act from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I feel it is worthwhile to point out that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has responsibility for supporting and servicing the needs of small businesses. This comes under the responsibility of the Ministry of State for Small Businesses, which is part of the same department.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Bosa moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am delighted to be able to propose second reading of this bill. The bill is entitled, "An Act to Amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act," and is one which I think will receive the acquiescence of the Senate reasonably easily. I always remember my seatmate, Senator Laird, referring to a bill as being a very simple bill, and we proceeded to take about three weeks to pass it. However, I do feel that this particular bill is one which will meet with the approval of senators, although I will point out a possible amendment.

First, let me explain what the Farm Improvement Loans Act is all about and what it attempts to do. This act was first introduced in 1945 and has since become a major source of funding for intermediate term loans to Canadian farmers. I might say that most of the loans are from 10 to 15 years. These are loans made to farmers by chartered banks at a rate which is one per cent above prime, and are guaranteed by the Government of Canada. However, the banks deal with the loans on the same basis as they would with any normal loan in the sense that it is their responsibility to make sure the loans are adequately secured, that there is a reasonable repayment opportunity, and that there is a minimum of risk. The result has been an excellent record of repayment.

Since 1945, $4.2 billion has been loaned. Honourable senators may be interested to know that last year the net cost to the Government of Canada for guaranteeing this immense amount of money was $262,000; the year before, $289,000; and the year before that, $190,000. The loss experienced is probably lower than any other credit instrument. The Government of Canada, in guaranteeing these loans which are there to provide farmers across the country with the opportunity to borrow money for farm improvements, for their buildings, for the purchase of equipment, for the acquisition of land, and for a variety of other farm needs, has created an opportunity which has not been abused.

The major impact of the bill is to increase the present amount of $75,000 available to an individual farmer to $100,000. The other major item in the bill is that it extends the act for another three years. The existing act will expire on June 30.

You may be interested in how the loans are used. In 1978, 78 per cent of the loans was for the purchase of farm machinery; 10 per cent was for the construction, repair, and alterations of farm houses, buildings, et cetera; eight per cent was for purchases of additional farm land; and four per cent was for other improvements such as clearing of land, irrigation and projects of that nature. These loans are certainly very useful.

In itself the Farm Improvement Loans Act would not be enough to satisfy farmers across the country. There are many other substantial assistance programs under federal and, indeed, most provincial jurisdictions designed to assist farmers in getting into the farming business and being able to carry on. In Canada we have the Farm Credit Act, which is very important. The Province of Saskatchewan has a Farm Start Program that enables young farmers to borrow money at reasonable interest in order to acquire land to start farming.

What is contained in this bill is first, an opportunity to extend the act for three years, and secondly to increase the amount available to an individual farmer from $75,000 to $100,000.

The argument with respect to this bill is perhaps the same as Senator Bosa mentioned in connection with the Small Businesses Loans Act, that is, with inflation a higher capital loan value is required. It is important that farmers have enough money to be able to carry on their operations; to borrow money from banks at reasonable interest rates; and to have encouragement to improve their productivity by the purchase of machinery and other required improvements to their farm operations.

You may recall that I mentioned the possibility of an amendment. I am not sure that $100,000 is enough. I am not even sure whether the Senate would have the authority to increase that amount.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Buckwold: I have been talking with the Minister of Agriculture, and he indicated that they might consider another amount. If I am advised that it would be beyond the power of the Senate to increase the amount to $150,000, which, I remind senators, results in very, very little cost, if any, to the Government of Canada because of the excellent loan repayment record, then perhaps it would not be possible for us to deal with it here. I am certainly in your hands in this regard.

• (1540)

I commend the bill on behalf of the farmers of Canada for your approval. I hope that it will be dealt with in due course so that by June 30 a new act will be in place to enable this important part of our economic society to participate fully in the growth of our economy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: I would like to ask the same question that I directed to Senator Bosa. Fortunately, Senator Buckwold also happens to be a director of the Bank of Montreal, so we do not have to worry about bringing in some of the experts from the bank. May I ask Senator Buckwold, in view of this very excellent loss rate, why the Bank of Montreal would need a government guarantee?

Senator Buckwold: Perhaps I am in a conflict of interest here, but I am not trying to speak as an experienced bank expert, which I am not. I just happen to be a very major debtor of banks; maybe that is why I am in the position that I am. The answer is that there are many businesses that have a risk element, such as farming, that will not be able to borrow at one per cent above prime. Those of you who are close to the farm scene would agree, I am sure, that most farm loan rates would be much higher, so that the one per cent above prime represents a loan that may not be the very best. General Motors might not pay it, but certainly for most borrowers one per cent above prime would represent a very good loan. That would not be available to farmers under most bank programs without the government guarantee.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I support what has been said by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, and I would suggest favourable consideration of this bill, Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

[Senator Buckwold.]

First, the amendment would renew the program for another three years, that is, from July 1, 1980, to June 30, 1983; and, secondly, it would raise the maximum a farmer could borrow from $75,000 to $100,000.

I would be inclined to support an amendment to go to $150,000—as was intimated by the honourable senator opposite—but I understand the Senate is not competent to deal with that sort of an amendment. Certainly, as the bill indicates, to raise the maximum from $75,000 to $100,000 is required when you consider rising costs for machinery, equipment and land. Other requirements for farmers to maintain and to expand their production are such that the maximum should at least be $100,000, as spelled out in the bill.

As Senator Buckwold pointed out, the Farm Improvement Loans Act has been in place since 1945, and the program has been extended from time to time usually, I believe, for three years. This certainly indicates the requirement for the program and the need for its continuance. Farmers are good credit risks. The farm improvement loans have cost the federal government very little.

Some comment was made in Senator Buckwold's opening remarks about the loss ratio. I understand it has been in the realm of .14 per cent down to .08 per cent last year, and that something over 22,000 farmers have used the program. I recommend passage of this bill, and I see no reason for referring it to committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: Is there any particular reason why the bill is renewed for three years at a time?

Senator Buckwold: I could not give an expert answer on that. I could only guess that three years gives an opportunity to review the capital amount, that is, the $100,000 limit which is being recommended now; and that in three years we will take another look at it and it may go up to $150,000. If we do not have any more inflation or if we have deflation, it might go down to $75,000. But that is wishful thinking. You never know, with a very good government on this side! Perhaps that is one of the reasons for the three-year period: it gives an opportunity to review it quite often.

Senator Macdonald: It would seem to me that there is no point in having any time limit on it. You can always review it and always raise the amount. Was there any particular reason why it was for a three-year term?

Senator Buckwold: There may be some restrictions by the Department of Finance in this kind of a commitment, which is a loan guarantee, by the Government of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not want to be too formal in procedure, but I presume the debate has been concluded?

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some Hon. Senators: Next sitting.

Senator Buckwold: Unfortunately, I will be away tomorrow. If you wish to deal with it today, I would be glad to move third reading now. I see that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition is very pleasantly shaking his head, and so I will move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Nielsen had been substituted for that of Mr. Hnatyshyn on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving budgets of the following committees:

Banking, Trade and Commerce;

Foreign Affairs;

Health, Welfare and Science;

National Finance.

(For texts of reports, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

REPORT APPROVING SALARY REVISIONS TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a schedule of authorized salary revisions for certain Senate positions, effective April 1, 1980, as approved by the committee today.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 17, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the motion as put is, of course, quite customary, and I have no problem with it. However, I think this is a good occasion on which to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government what the intentions are for the following two weeks. Is it the intention of the Senate to sit on the Wednesdays following June 24 and July 1?

Senator Frith: The present intention is to sit on those days.

Senator Flynn: Which days?

Senator Frith: The Wednesday after St. Jean Baptiste Day and the Wednesday after July 1. It is also our intention to consult with our counterparts, when we know what kind of business we are going to be dealing with, and decide whether it would be worthwhile for us to come back for both those weeks.

Senator Flynn: Would you say that we would be sitting on the Wednesday afternoon in both cases?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: I understand there may be some interest on your side in regard to not sitting in the week of July 1, in view of the events of the following weekend.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

ABSENCE OF OIL-PRICING AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON SEPTEMBER MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Would the Leader of the Government tell us if it is the policy of the government that an agreement on oil pricing with the energy-producing provinces is critical to the achievement of success in the constitutional negotiations now under way?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is an important question. The government, of course, would like to have that as a prior condition. The matter is presently being discussed.

Senator Balfour: As a supplementary, is the Leader of the Government aware of the fact that yesterday Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan joined Premier Lougheed in suggesting that there is a direct relationship between the two sets of talks, and that the absence of an oil-pricing agreement will directly affect the chances for success of the constitutional negotiations in September?

Senator Perrault: The government is aware of certain positions taken by certain premiers with respect to the talks and the priorities which have been established by these governments. It should be borne in mind that statements have been made by other provincial and party leaders on other aspects of the talks. This process is not unexpected. The information is known to the government.

Senator Balfour: As a final supplementary, would the leader tell us if the government agrees with the sentiments expressed by Premier Blakeney and if it still expects resolution of the oil-pricing situation before the existing agreement expires on July 1?

Senator Perrault: I think the honourable senator is aware that strenuous efforts have been made by representatives of the federal government to achieve some agreement with respect to oil pricing. Those efforts are continuing and will continue during the weeks to come. Hopefully this matter can be resolved in advance of the September meeting of first ministers.

AIRLINES

APPLICATION OF EASTERN PROVINCIAL AIRWAYS TO EXTEND SERVICES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question relates to the air service between Halifax and Toronto sought by Eastern Provincial Airways. An appeal was launched to the cabinet not long ago. I base my question on a remark attributed to the Minister of Transport the other day, to the effect that there are people in the maritimes who prefer the CP service. I should like to say, as a preamble to my question, that there are some, a few, in that category, and I would also say, "Shame on them."

I would ask the Leader of the Government to bear in mind the importance and significance of EPA to the total Atlantic economy, especially Prince Edward Island. Can he give us an indication when the cabinet may be acting upon the very important appeal for the reversal of a very wrong decision?

● (1410)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first of all, may I say that in the view of most Canadians who are well served by the air carriers of this nation, including Air Canada, CP Air and Eastern Provincial Airways, these are three good airlines. There are many others in this country. Secondly, may I say that the question of routes in Atlantic Canada, and connections to Toronto, has been of active interest to many members of cabinet. Discussions have been held during the past week. I personally, as a government minister, have been involved in meetings with both Canadian Pacific and EPA, and I think that a useful solution is going to be found to this particular problem.

THE CONSTITUTION

ASPECTS OF SENATE STUDY

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. My question is based on item number four on the order paper, the motion made by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, and the amendment made by the Honourable Senator Flynn. The Task Force on Canadian Unity listed seven functions of a second chamber, and then went on to state that this chamber has failed in all except the first two. Would the leader consider having the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs study this aspect, and then report back? In the meantime the motion of Senator Lamontagne and the amendment of Senator Flynn could be held in abeyance. I think it would help both sides of the debate if this study were carried out first.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators may wish to reconstitute that committee, to complete its report or investigate other aspects of constitutional reform. It is not for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to dictate or direct that that activity be undertaken.

Senator Flynn: Did you say that without a smile?

POST OFFICE

REQUEST BY LETTER CARRIERS UNION TO RENEGOTIATE CONTRACT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In the light of the answer that the minister kindly provided yesterday, relative to my previous question on the settlement with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, I wonder if the minister would inform the Senate as to what the government's plans are in response to the request of the Letter Carriers Union, who have asked that their contract be reopened in view of the settlement with the inside workers. I recognize that the working environment is somewhat different, as the minister pointed out yesterday, but nonetheless the letter carriers feel they have a legitimate grievance in this connection.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it would be unwise and unfair for me to offer an opinion on a looming negotiation when the facts are not before me and when the rationale for any settlement has not been spelled out to the interested parties.

Senator Doody: I gather, then, from the answer of the minister, that there is in fact a set of negotiations looming, which means that the contract will be reopened.

The others who seem to be particularly concerned with this situation—and this arises out of a question that I asked prior to today—are the supervisors. There are some four thousand plus supervisors, who apparently feel that the settlement they have received gives them lesser benefits than those of the people they supervise. As I asked earlier, how do we expect these supervisors to see that forty hours of work is done in a 37½ hour week if the people they are supervising will be getting greater benefits than they? Is it the intention of the government to reopen their contract as well?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

ENFORCEMENT OF SEPTEMBER DEADLINE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that the position of Mr. Claude Ryan, Leader of the Quebec Liberal Party, is similar to that adopted by five provincial premiers concerning the ultimate date in September to report substantial, perhaps even final, progress on the items on the agenda, as stated by the Right Honourable Prime Minister, could the Leader of the Government ask the Prime Minister whether he is still inflexible with respect to this ultimate date in September to obtain a final consensus concerning the items on the proposed agenda?

• (1415)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, inquiries will go forward on the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. The statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance was to the effect that there has been no decision on whether the September 12 deadline will be strictly enforced. Agreement on all 12 topics of discussion has not been reached. Indeed, he would offer no comment, and that must also be my decision.

THE ECONOMY

ASSISTANCE TO SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin on June 10, concerning the government's intention to introduce legislation to authorize the small business development bond program.

I am pleased to inform the Senate that my colleague the Minister of Finance intends very shortly to announce guidelines which will remove any confusion which may exist among small businessmen concerning the operation of this program. I can confirm that it is definitely the intention of the government to proceed with legislation in this area in the near future, and the assurance of the honourable senator that his colleagues in the other place will co-operate to facilitate passage of this measure is much appreciated. This co-operation will ensure that an important program to assist the key small business sector of the economy will proceed without undue delay.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of privilege, I really cannot allow my honourable friend to put such an outrageous interpretation on my remarks or to put such words in my mouth. If he will kindly read to the Senate what I said, I will be content to stand on that; but to have him put the interpretation he has just placed on the words I used is really quite out of order.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will withdraw that part of the reply that refers to the honourable senator's assurance. Perhaps I am at fault for putting that interpretation on what he said. So I withdraw that part of the comment.

Senator Roblin: I should hope so.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO TAIWAN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question that was asked by Senator Muir yesterday as to whether negotiations are under way with Taiwan for the sale of Candu reactors. I can tell the honourable senator that no discussions are being held or contemplated with the Government of Taiwan concerning the sale of Candu reactors. The honourable senator may be aware that no such discussions have been held with the Government of Taiwan since Canada announced recognition of mainland China. There is no immediate prospect of a change in this situation. This is due to the fact that Canada does not recognize Taiwan's claim to be the government of all of China, thereby precluding the government-to-government agreements that are necessary in the field of nuclear sales.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT TO PRESS BY CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if that is the last of the delayed answers, I should like to rise to point out that on May 14 I asked a question about the alleged utterances of Ambassador Dupuy who, in my judgment, made imputations against the former government which were not appropriate from any ambassador of this country.

• (1420)

I asked at the time this matter was to be looked into whether or not the ambassador did make those statements. If he did, it strikes me that he cast implications and aspersions upon the then government; but if he did not make them, I am casting imputations upon him. I think that in the virtue and value of the proper decorum of Canada's representatives abroad, this matter should have been dealt with. An answer should have been given in this chamber as to whether or not this distinguished ambassador made those comments and cast those reflections upon a former government and, as it turns out, on a former minister who happens to be a member of this chamber, Senator Asselin.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as yet no reply has been received from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I understand that they are in the process of attempting to obtain a copy of the speech or the alleged remarks, and that information will be brought before the Senate as quickly as possible. A further inquiry will go forward this afternoon.

HELSINKI FINAL ACT—PREPARATION FOR REVIEW CONFERENCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on May 27, 1980.

He asked whether, in view of the interest of parliamentarians of both houses in the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, it is the intention of the government to give parliamentarians of both houses an input in the preparation for the review meeting of the Conference on European Co-operation and Security.

At the present moment the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence can consider it under the umbrella of the main estimates. Parliamentarians of both houses can participate in the discussion through the Helsinki Monitoring Group, which has members from both the Senate and the other place.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO AND MIRABEL AIRPORTS—INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on May 29 Senator Smith (Colchester) asked whether the government was considering increases in user and landing fees at Ministry of Transport owned and operated airports.

Transport Canada has proposed increases in landing fees and general terminal fees at Transport Canada operated airports, effective October 1, 1980. Transport Canada has advised air industry associations of these proposals and has invited them to meet and discuss the proposals. Meetings have already taken place with several of these associations, including the Air Transport Association of Canada, and the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association. The proposed increases include:

—a 15 per cent increase in domestic and international landing fees for turbo-prop and jet aircraft at all Transport Canada operated airports, except those in the Arctic;

—a 15 per cent increase in domestic and non-domestic general terminal fees at 23 major airports where the fees are in place;

—an increase from $1.65 to $5.00 in the piston-engine aircraft landing fee at four airports: Vancouver, Toronto, Dorval and Mirabel. These are the only four airports where piston-engine aircraft are subject to a landing fee and there is no proposal to extend the fee to additional airports. An increase in the fee to $5 is required to raise the fee to a reasonable level;

—an increase in minimum landing fees for turbo-prop and jet aircraft at all Transport Canada operated airports, except those in the Arctic. The proposed minimum fee is $3 at the smaller airports, $4 at 12 regional airports, and $5 at 23 major airports. Few aircraft (less than 100) would be affected by this increase;

—a 15 per cent increase in flying club or commercial flying school landing fees for turbo-prop and jet aircraft at all Transport Canada operated airports, except those in the Arctic.

Transport Canada has also developed preliminary proposals for increases, effective April 1, 1981. These proposals include:

—a 20 per cent increase in domestic and international landing fees for turbo-prop and jet aircraft at all Transport Canada operated airports, except those in the Arctic;

—a 15 per cent increase in domestic and non-domestic general terminal fees at 23 major airports where the fees are in place;

—extend domestic and non-domestic general terminal fees, at reduced rates, to 12 additional airports;

—a 19 per cent increase in the Polar Route Fee.

Air industry associations have been advised of these preliminary proposals for April 1, 1981, and consultations are planned.

• (1425)

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Leader of the Government for his full answer.

As a supplementary question, I should like to know whether or not these increases are in pursuance of some announced policy of the Department of Transport or of the government with respect to the principle of "user-pay," which was the subject of lively discussion a year or so ago.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISHERIES—EAST COAST BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question arising out of a written answer which appeared in yesterday's Debates of the Senate at page 451, having to do with the controversy over the fishery boundaries between Canada and the United States. The answer indicates that "The government is actively examining available options in the event that these treaties are not given [U.S.] Senate consent in the very near future." Can the Leader of the Government produce the available options that Canada might take if the dispute is not resolved in the near future, because it is playing havoc with the fishing industry in Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): While the question will be taken as notice, I would suggest to the honourable senator that describing in detail the options available to this nation would not assist our bargaining position vis-à-vis the United States. The question will go forward.

TRANSPORT

PASSENGER TRAFFIC AND EXPENDITURES AT AIRPORTS

Question No. 2—By Hon. Joan Neiman:

With respect to airports in:

St. John's, Nfld.
Halifax, N.S.
Dorval, Que.
Mirabel, Que.
Ottawa, Ont.
Toronto, Ont. (Terminal I) (Terminal II)
Winnipeg, Man.
Saskatoon, Sask.
Edmonton, Alta.
Calgary, Alta., and Vancouver, B.C.

1. What was (a) the volume of passenger traffic, and (b) the value of cargo traffic through each airport in each fiscal year from 1969-70 to 1979-80, inclusive, and what are the anticipated figures for each airport in the fiscal year 1980-81?

2. What sums of money have been expended, or allocated, for disbursement during each of the aforementioned years with respect to each airport in the following categories:

(a) Repairs, renovations, alterations and additions to existing passenger facilities;

(b) New passenger facilities;

(c) Repairs, renovations, alterations and additions to cargo facilities;

(d) New cargo facilities; and

(e) Repairs, renovations and additions to runway facilities?

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the third reading of Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, before the question is put, may I say that there were two questions put to me in yesterday's debate which, if it is agreeable, I would be pleased to answer now.

The first question I should like to answer was put to me by Senator Guay after the debate. Senator Guay wanted to know what safeguards the government had undertaken to prevent a loan being denied to a qualified borrower because of personal animosity that might exist on the part of the manager of a lending institution. The answer is that the government does not become aware of the transaction until the transaction has been made. Therefore, the only recourse the borrower would have would be to go to another branch or to another lending institution.

[Senator Neiman.]

The second question I should like to answer was put to me by Senator Godfrey and is found at page 453 of yesterday's Debates of the Senate. Senator Godfrey said he was puzzled "why the banks were not in this on their own when there was only a loss of 0.4 per cent." The answer is that small businesses could not possibly obtain such a favourable rate were it not for the guarantee of the government. Furthermore, my understanding is that the banks are prevented from making long-term loans on the basis of the kind of collateral that these small businesses would put up.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith, for Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, moved the third reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William J. Petten moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers.

He said: Honourable senators, the object of Bill C-21 is to provide enabling legislation for the implementation in Canada of the International Convention for Safe Containers. I might add that this bill has been through this chamber on three previous occasions, twice presented by myself and once excellently presented by my colleague the Honourable Senator Macdonald, on October 31 last. This is the fourth occasion, so I shall try to be as brief as I can and still cover the bill.

Senator Flynn: Think of the new members.

Senator Petten: The bill is identical to former Bill S-5, with the exception of some technical changes. I would like briefly to review the purpose of the bill by outlining its main provisions. The bill and the convention scheduled to the bill set out criteria for the safety approval of containers used in international transport, thereby providing for conformity by the Canadian container industry with internationally accepted minimum safety standards. Container owners will obtain safety approval for such containers, and this approval is to be evidenced on each container by a safety approval plate. Container owners will be required, in addition to the initial safety approval, to carry out periodic inspection of containers in accordance with Canadian coast guard approved procedures. Criteria to be examined in the approval of examination procedures submitted to the coast guard are to include a description of the examination procedure to be used, the qualifications of inspection personnel to be employed by the container owner and the nature of the trade in which the containers are engaged. Based on this information, a period between examinations for the specified containers will be approved, with a maximum period of two years.

It is expected that, for the most part, present container periodic examination schemes employed by owners will satisfy this requirement. The date of the next required examination is to be marked on or adjacent to the safety approval plate, for the benefit of inspection by national authorities. If at any time there is evidence to believe that the condition of the container is such as to create a risk of safety, the owner will be required to take such container out of service until it has been restored to a safe condition. A valid safety approval plate will constitute a safety passport, in effect, facilitating the movement of a container internationally. The evidence of safety certification to internationally accepted standards, and the periodic inspection having been carried out on a container, will minimize requirements for inspection by national authorities.

Structural safety requirements and tests in addition to those specified in Annex II of the Schedule to this bill can be imposed only for purposes of air transport and for containers specially designed for the transport of dangerous goods and bulk liquids.

There are provisions for the Minister of Transport to direct an inquiry with respect to an accident or incident involving a cargo container where personal safety, property or environmental damage is a factor.

With this summary of the provisions of the bill and the contemplated approach to give effect to the container safety measures, I should like to emphasize that the container industry currently has a fine safety record. It is necessary to ensure that this be maintained, given the increased use of containerized traffic in international transport. The regulatory approach proposed to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers, which has been developed in concert with the private sector and with provincial governments, and which has their support, will contribute significantly to the maintenance of this standard.

I should further like to emphasize that the administration of the regulations made pursuant to the enactment of this bill will not incur any requirement for increased resources. The regulations will be administered by the Canadian coast guard. It is intended that safety certification of containers will be done by utilizing organizations such as those already providing classification standards in Canada for shipbuilding and structural steel construction. I am speaking of such organizations as Lloyd's Register of Shipping, Bureau Veritas and the American Bureau of Shipping. This process will be audited, but not duplicated, by the coast guard.

Control is to be exercised by coast guard marine surveyors at the ports of exit and entry to the country, where there will be spot checks of containers. They will be assisted as required on an on-call basis by rail safety inspectors of the CTC at offices in major centres across the country, and communication channels are being established with customs exit and entry points to respond to cases where containers with obvious safety risks or invalid safety approval plates are observed in transit in the course of normal operations. These cases are expected to be rare exceptions.

Honourable senators will recall that the International Convention for Safe Containers was adopted by the 1972 Conference on International Container Traffic, which was held jointly by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe and the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization, IMCO, a specialized agency of the United Nations.

A Canadian delegation participated in the development of this international convention and signed it subject to its later ratification by Canada. This convention has not as yet been ratified by Canada, a process which requires the prior enactment of this legislation. There are now some 27 contracting parties to the International Convention for Safe Containers.

Honourable senators, the implementation of this convention will provide the Canadian public with a system that involves a minimum level of regulation essential to maintaining the necessary degree of safety assurance required in Canada in the international movement of container traffic. It will avoid possible disruption in the flow of Canadian containerized goods to and from the many countries which are contracting parties to the convention, and which will be checking containers entering their territories for conformity with the terms of the convention.

I should like to note here that such controls are expected to be applied in full force by September, 1982, so the time remaining for the Canadian industry to bring container fleets into compliance with the terms of the convention is becoming short.

Lastly, and perhaps of most importance, implementation of the International Convention for Safe Containers will ensure that Canadian interests can benefit from international uniformity in the application of the national laws concerning safe usage of freight containers in international transport.

Honourable senators, in summary, passage of this legislation will allow compliance with the convention with a minimum amount of industry control, will deal responsibly with Canada's international interest and public safety requirements in this important transportation area, and will benefit Canadian industry and the Canadian public by facilitating the movement of Canadian containerized goods in foreign ports. Honourable senators, I ask for your support for Bill C-21.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CONSTITUTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider and report upon constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and upon the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

That the membership of the committee be increased to thirty members and that Rule 67(1)(j) be suspended in relation to membership of the committee;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the first paragraph of the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "upon" in the second line and substituting the following therefor:—

"the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights".—(Honourable Senator Tremblay).

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. First of all, I would seek leave to make a few comments, which will last about 12 minutes and which I was unable to make last Wednesday during my first intervention. They will provide clearer explanations on the third element of my motion which concerns the following:

—alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

I consider this third part of the motion to be probably the most important, and I believe that it extends the terms of this motion much further than the reform of the Senate. In my opinion, honourable senators are entitled to know the full significance of this third element before voting not only on the motion but also on the amendment. In fact, I have another reason for seeking leave at this time, and it is that I shall not be able to be present in this house next Tuesday and Wednesday.

[Senator Petten.]

Senator Flynn: Well, if I understand the honourable senator, what he is saying is that he has forgotten to tell us about the most important part of his proposal. Why did he not do so? I do not know. However, I find this a bit strange. In any case, if he has now realized that he failed the first time, perhaps he wants another chance. Does Senator Frith intend to speak after him?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: You will therefore explain the speech of Senator Lamontagne!

Senator Frith: This might be.

Senator Lamontagne: Do I have consent?

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne—

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Senator Lamontagne has asked permission to speak a second time on the amendment to provide some explanations.

Senator Denis: He has already done so.

Senator Flynn: No, he said he would speak for 12 minutes. He has not spoken for 12 minutes. At least, it did not seem that long to me. Permission granted.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I certainly do not want to start another quarrel with my great friend, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: What quarrel? I give you leave.

Senator Lamontagne: Yes, of course. I wish to thank honourable senators for giving me leave to explain that part of my motion which refers, and I quote, to alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism.

To me, renewed federalism—quite apart from other things, including a new division of jurisdiction—also means the development of a truly federal system within which the two orders of government will be legally and really sovereign. This last aspect of constitutional reform may be seen as being as important as the division of jurisdiction. Indeed, over the years—and I am sure that Senator Roblin would agree with me—and at least until recently, provincial governments have been complaining not so much about their lack of legislative powers as about federal intrusion into their areas of jurisdiction. Moreover, this problem arises in Canada irrespective of the division of powers or the division of jurisdictions, and it must be solved as a separate issue.

In 1867, for reasons that I still believe were justified at that time, the Canadian Constitution put the provinces under a system which I describe as federal tutorship or domination. In other words, we had a quasi-unitary state. That system was expressed by several extraordinary powers conferred upon the federal government, including the power of disallowance and a practically unlimited spending power. It enabled the central government to intervene in various arbitrary ways into areas of provincial jurisdiction. According to a great number of Canadians, such a system of federal tutorship is no longer desirable, and in the future it should evolve toward a regime of true federalism within which the two orders of government would be sovereign within their respective jurisdictions.

This basic federal principle of constitutional reform has been proposed by the white paper entitled "Time for Action" issued by the Canadian government in 1978, by the Pepin-Robarts Task Force, by the beige paper of the Quebec Liberal Party and by most other federalist groups.

In some respects, however, the application of that principle raises difficulties. For instance, all the groups I have just mentioned agree that the central government should keep the spending and the declaratory powers it now has in order to maintain some flexibility within the whole political system. But then the question arises, is it possible to devise a new constitutional arrangement that would preserve those federal powers and, at the same time, respect the principle of sovereignty of both orders of government? Such an arrangement, in my view, would have to meet two basic requirements. First, it would have to enable provincial governments to control the exercise of the federal extraordinary powers in their areas of jurisdiction. This is what I call the provincial requirement. Secondly, this arrangement would also have to be compatible with true federalism, and respect the integrity and sovereignty of the federal order of government. This is what I call the federal requirement.

It is obvious that the Senate, as presently constituted, cannot meet what I have just described as the provincial requirement. This chamber cannot claim to be a credible spokesman for provincial governments.

Senator Asselin: Why not?

Senator Lamontagne: It was not designed originally to fulfil that function, and it was never expected to do so, although, as Senator Tremblay reminded us the other day, it was expected to reflect broad regional interests and aspirations, which is quite a different thing. That inability of the present Senate to meet the provincial requirement, which I described a moment ago, led various groups, more particularly in the last two or three years, to look for a more suitable constitutional arrangement. The House of the Federation proposed in Bill C-60 proved, for various reasons, to be an unacceptable alternative. Basically, as in the case of the present Senate, it could not satisfy the provincial requirement. It would represent political parties, not provincial governments, and it would still be dominated by federal forces. Thus, alternative arrangements have been put forward.

The Pepin-Robarts Task Force, the British Columbia government and other groups have proposed that the Senate be replaced by a new second chamber of the Canadian Parliament, to be called the House of the Provinces or the Council of the Federation, and composed exclusively of representatives of provincial governments. I made a detailed criticism of the Pepin-Robarts proposal in a speech in this chamber on January 30, 1979. Senators Connolly and Lang have more recently presented their own forceful arguments against it.

In my view, that proposal and other similar projects, while they could, in a rather clumsy way, satisfy the provincial requirement, do not meet the federal requirement. They are not compatible with federalism. They would replace federal tutorship by provincial tutorship. They would introduce a confederal chamber into a federal Parliament. They would introduce into a legislative body, the Canadian Parliament, a second chamber composed exclusively of representatives of the executive branch of another sphere of government. Perhaps we would have to accept such a hybrid and monstrous body to satisfy a most serious provincial grievance, if there were no other and better alternatives available to us.

However, the beige paper contains such an alternative, as Senator Godfrey so rightly pointed out in this chamber recently. Indeed, the federal council proposed by this document would meet the provincial requirement, because it would enable provincial governments to control the exercise of federal powers in their areas of jurisdiction. But it would also, in its basic features, satisfy and meet the federal requirement.

It is important to note that the council proposed in the beige paper would not be a legislative body, and it would not be part of the Canadian Parliament. It would be a special inter-governmental institution whose intervention would take place before the beginning of the formal federal legislative process. In this way, the sovereignty of the Canadian Parliament and its integrity as a federal institution would be preserved. In other words, such an arrangement would put an end to what I call federal tutorship without replacing it by provincial tutorship. My main objection to it is that it would add another highly complex institution to an already cumbersome political system.

Is this really necessary? I do not believe so. Canadian federalism has already developed a unique kind of mechanism called federal-provincial conferences. In spite of the criticisms that have been made against this typical Canadian institution, it is true to say that it has accomplished a most useful role in the past. The beige paper, the Pepin-Robarts report and other similar documents agree that this mechanism be preserved and improved as an essential feature of our federalism. Bill C-60 contained constitutional provisions to institutionalize it. Why not, then, assign to that institution, in addition to its other traditional functions, the constitutional role that the federal council would be expected to play? This mechanism, federal-provincial conferences, could even be identified from now on in our Constitution as the federal council. Such an approach would represent an important evolution, but not a revolution.

Senator Flynn: Would you get rid of tutorship, anyway?

Senator Lamontagne: Indeed, it has been the general practice for many years to submit federal proposals related to joint or shared-cost programs to federal-provincial conferences prior to their presentation to Parliament as legislative measures. The proposed arrangement would merely extend that practice and make it compulsory and more effective, in terms of provincial control, by inserting it into a new Constitution. That is why I describe this proposal as evolutionary rather than revolutionary.

I understand from press reports that Premier Lougheed has expressed his preference for this alternative arrangement over the creation of a separate federal council. According to the same sources, Mr. Ryan is prepared to look favourably at this new proposal. It is also possible to conclude, in the light of recent federal-provincial meetings, that most premiers would favour that approach, which is so uniquely Canadian. I suggest, therefore, that the Senate subcommittee, if it is created, should consider this alternative very seriously and very carefully.

I believe very strongly that, if we can find a practical and acceptable way that is compatible with true federalism to end the federal tutorship that has existed in our Constitution since 1867, we will have accomplished a major step toward a renewed federalism, better adjusted to the political realities of today and tomorrow. For this reason alone, although there are others, I feel that the mandate proposed in my motion is extremely important and is sufficiently broad, at least for the time being. It is also very urgent. Indeed, if we want to have an impact on agreements that might be reached in September at the inter-governmental level, we should be in a position to submit concrete proposals on this alternative arrangement not later than early in August.

As the subcommittee develops a new constitutional mechanism to end federal tutorship, in the spirit of true federalism, it should also, as the motion mentions, examine the future role and composition of the Senate, not as a confederal body but as a genuine federal institution. More particularly, it should consider how this chamber could play a specific role in the areas of the official languages and regional interests and aspirations. We have talked about Senate reform for many years. Now, in my view, is the time for action. We should not be ashamed of presenting concrete proposals for Senate reform; after all, many other groups have done so, although I feel they are much less knowledgeable than we are in this chamber. What is wrong with an institution that looks at itself and seeks to improve its role and usefulness?

Once this new scenario becomes available, it will be up to the Canadian people, the provincial governments and the Canadian Parliament to decide whether they still want such a reformed Senate as a federal parliamentary institution.

In conclusion, I submit that it would be unrealistic to expect the committee to do more from now until the first part of August than to produce a report with concrete recommendations on the three important topics mentioned in my motion. In the meantime, if we want to tackle the other subjects on the agenda of the First Ministers Conference that will be held in September, the only practical way of doing it is to organize a special debate in this chamber at the appropriate time, as the Leader of the Government has already suggested.

Finally, I suggest that we should review the whole situation after the September meeting and decide then, in light of the results of that conference, what further initiative we as the Senate should take. If we then consider that it would still be desirable for us to launch an inquiry into the other aspects of renewed federalism, including the division of jurisdictions, we may come to the conclusion that it would be preferable to assign that task to a special committee rather than to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

For all those reasons, I must state again that unfortunately I cannot accept Senator Flynn's amendment. I plead: Stop quibbling and move on to the urgent, important and practical job that lies immediately ahead of us and which is contained in my motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Would Senator Lamontagne allow me a question?

He insisted on the importance of the committee's being in a position by August to examine the whole issue of the composition and role of the Senate in the Constitution. I think Senator Lamontagne spent several minutes stressing the priority of that question, is that not right?

Am I to understand that the first duty of that committee, according to the remarks Senator Lamontagne has just made, would be to consider the question of the Upper House? Am I to understand that?

Senator Lamontagne: First of all, as the motion says, and as I tried to explain—indeed, the motion is very clear on the first two points, I think—the committee would consider and report upon individual and collective rights.

Secondly—

Hon. Martial Asselin: You dropped that.

Senator Lamontagne: Pardon?

Senator Asselin: You dropped that?

Senator Lamontagne: No, no.

Senator Asselin: You gave priority to—

Senator Lamontagne: No, no.

Senator Asselin: You did not explain that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He cannot explain it.

Senator Lamontagne: That is in the motion.

Senator Asselin: But are you not dropping individual and collective rights?

Senator Lamontagne: No.

Senator Asselin: And are you concentrating your consideration only on the renewal of the Upper House?

Senator Lamontagne: First of all, the terms of reference of the committee would be to consider—in light of the documents that already exist, and there are already several of them—individual and collective rights.

Second, the future role and composition of the Senate as a federal chamber, not a confederal chamber.

Third, to develop a new mechanism which henceforth would allow provincial governments to have control over the exercise of the extraordinary powers the federal government has in their fields of jurisdiction which is another matter, I think, apart from the reform of the Senate as a purely federal institution.

So I say that this motion has three different and very important elements, and the committee should consider those three elements concurrently.

Senator Asselin: And report by August 1?

Senator Deschatelets: Your remarks today, Senator Lamontagne, if I understand correctly, do not change in any way the order of priorities you set in your motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to rise on a question of privilege.

I believe that the speech Senator Lamontagne has just made has enabled him to gain the floor under a pretence that is, in my opinion, very doubtful.

He could have mentioned that during the debate on the main motion, or on the amendment. However, if every time we are not satisfied with the reaction we get we have a right to speak twice, well, honourable senators, I submit everyone in this house will have the right to speak two or three times. The tactic of Senator Lamontagne is simply to rally his troops.

I therefore submit that this discipline of the party in power is the best argument of the opponents of the Senate. You are totally lacking in flexibility and you are unable to accept that the opposition could be right.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I firmly object to the comments of Senator Flynn. I would simply like to explain that there is absolutely no tactic—

Senator Flynn: Is this another speech?

Senator Lamontagne: No, I am simply replying to your question of privilege. Are we not a democratic assembly?

Senator Flynn: No, unfortunately.

Senator Lamontagne: Because of you! I was saying that I did not make a speech on the main motion because at that time I was convinced, because of our discussions and consultations, that there would be no objection to the main motion. I therefore did not make a speech at that time.

Senator Flynn: You knew quite well what would happen.

Senator Lamontagne: In the second place, after my honourable friend moved his amendment, when I tried to elaborate on my comments and to say precisely what I stated this afternoon, it was Senator Flynn who objected.

Senator Flynn: Not at all. You are raising an issue which is irrelevant to the one I raised, because when I rose following introduction of the motion, I invited you to explain your motion if you wanted to, and I gave you notice that I wanted to move an amendment. I did so. Afterwards, you had the opportunity to make your comments, but you did so badly. You then decided that you wanted another chance today, especially since there was some hesitation on your side of the house and you are now trying to rally your forces.

Senator Asselin: I have a question for Senator Lamontagne. In his speech today, he mentioned a new work method. He said that what was most important was to suggest a renewed formula for the Upper Chamber and that this should be done before August 1. I want to ask a very simple question, and I could also ask it of the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Last session, a special committee was formed with Senator Stanbury as chairman. This committee worked for many weeks before proposing exactly what Senator Lamontagne wants to propose. Instead of wasting our time considering the motion moved by Senator Lamontagne, would it not be more reasonable, first of all, to re-establish the committee chaired by Senator Stanbury, and to ask it to table its conclusions, because a number of senators worked hard during the last session on this special Senate committee to find a new formula for an Upper Chamber, such as suggested by Senator Lamontagne. He says no because this is not his idea.

Senator Lamontagne: That is not what I suggested.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, in order to expedite our work, would it not be more practical that Senator Stanbury's committee be re-established and the conclusion of its report tabled? Time and money have been invested by the Senate to establish that committee, and we could then consider what Senator Lamontagne has in mind. Apparently there is a desire to put aside that committee's report. We did not re-establish that committee, yet Senator Lamontagne would like us to start anew. Is that what you want, or not?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I do not think I am a complete idiot.

Senator Asselin: We shall see.

Senator Lamontagne: I included in the motion the consideration of individual and collective rights. But that was Senator Tremblay's suggestion. There is no intention to start over again the work already undertaken in that area. There now exists a unanimous report by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons that was published in the fall of 1978, and it includes very specific recommendations in that area.

So there would be no question of that group starting from scratch, but it would simply be a matter of taking note of that committee's recommendations and determining whether they still apply under the current conditions.

When it comes to considering the future role and make-up of the Senate, clearly the group will not start over again all the studies that have been made. It will take note of them, as well as the proceedings and public hearings of that special committee, in addition to the reports already prepared and published. The aim is not at all to re-invent the wheel. However, I feel that we could put some emphasis on the third part of my proposal. It involves something that is new, in my view. I would further remind Senator Asselin that the third part is not aimed at creating a second chamber within our Canadian Parliament, but quite the opposite, preventing what in my view would be a serious mistake, and trying to ensure that from now on—

Senator Flynn: We heard that point before.

Senator Lamontagne: As I said, in considering that third part we would attempt to ensure that from now on the monitoring by provincial governments would proceed at the intergovernmental level rather than within Parliament.

Senator Asselin: I would like to ask a question of Senator Frith, the deputy government leader. What happens to that special committee that was chaired by Senator Stanbury? Is it still-born? Will it report to the Senate? What are the contents of the studies made by that committee for weeks on end? Were taxpayers' money and the energy of senators spent so that we can never know the conclusions? In these circumstances, maybe the report could answer all the questions asked by Senator Lamontagne, and that will be asked anew by that sub-committee on legal and constitutional affairs. Could he answer my question as to what happens with that special committee that was not re-established?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few comments on the amendment, and I would therefore address that question within the context of my remarks.

Senator Asselin: No answer. As far as I am concerned, I would like to look more closely at what was said this afternoon by Senator Lamontagne, since he served us terms out of the ordinary, especially when he spoke of trusteeship federalism.

Senator Flynn: Hear, hear!

Senator Asselin: So I would like to know where that stems from. As far as I am concerned, I move the adjournment of the debate, quite simply.

[English]

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I was one of those who happily agreed to allow Senator Lamontagne to intervene in the way he has, thinking, of course, that what he was going to deal with was some relatively small and incidental matter that somehow he had overlooked in his main speech. Now I find that really what he has been saying—or it seems so to me—is the main subject matter of what he meant to say in his speech.

My point of privilege is this. I spoke on this amendment, and therefore, by the ordinary rules, just like Senator Lamontagne, I would not have the right to speak in reply to the comments he has made today. I am not prepared to speak to them today, but at some future date it seems to me that the same privilege should be accorded to those of us on this side, and on the other side, too, who spoke on the amendment, of speaking again in reference to the remarks of Senator Lamontagne.

[Senator Lamontagne.]

The Hon. the Speaker: If you will allow me, honourable senators, I should like to say that when Senator Lamontagne rose to speak I tried to intervene because Senator Lamontagne was supposed to speak instead of Senator Frith. I wanted to have the agreement of honourable senators but you did not give me a chance. You all said, "We agree," and he spoke. I did what I could. I have no power to do more than that, unless you find something different in the rules. Perhaps you are right when you say that you thought he was only going to make a few remarks, but there was no indication of any kind that would lead one to believe that it would be so. I did not know it would be a speech, but I think I made the effort at the beginning. I know it is not the custom for the Speaker to stop the discussion and say, "Wait a minute. I have something to tell you," and indeed, you would not have accepted that; but I made the effort to say, "This is not according to the rules." I wanted to have your agreement, and you gave your agreement, even before I asked you. This is what happened. Senator Flynn agreed and even you, Senator Smith, agreed. If you agreed then, you cannot now disagree.

Senator Flynn: That is not the point.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, if I may address my comments to what you have just said, I must say that I was not in the slightest way aiming any criticism at your honourable self. I had agreed, and I was not trying to withdraw that agreement, or to disagree. All I am saying is that having agreed, and having received something greater than I expected, it would not be unreasonable if I requested the same privilege, and if honourable senators were to agree to give it to me. I do not have the slightest criticism of your honour in any way.

Senator Lamontagne: In answer to this question of privilege I must remind my honourable colleague that I was very clear and very honest when I asked for leave to make my remarks. I said that I would limit my comments to this aspect of the motion.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that was the point.

Senator Lamontagne: I said also that unfortunately I would not be in the Senate next Tuesday night and next Wednesday, so that I would not even have the chance to speak on the main motion, though it would have been my right to do so.

I think I was very straightforward and very honest with my colleagues. Leave was given and I expressed gratitude for the fact that it was given. I do not see why you should be quibbling again, or regret having given leave after the fact.

The other day, when Senator Tremblay intervened, completely out of order, after the debate had been closed on the third reading of a bill, we gave him consent to speak. There was no problem.

Senator Asselin: Out of order, you say? Will you explain that?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I think that what was intended to be simply a request that I be granted the same privilege as was granted to the honourable senator, has sparked some misunderstanding. I say again that I agreed willingly, and I would agree if the same question were put to me again. I do not regret that I agreed. I do not try to withdraw my agreement. I only say that having agreed, and having heard what was said as a result of the agreement of all senators, I wish only to claim the same sort of privilege for myself.

• (1520)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if we have covered this particular point sufficiently, I might suggest that the comments indicate that more was said by Senator Lamontagne than was perhaps anticipated. I am sure that there is no intention on the other side to suggest any trickery, but merely some disappointment that more was said than was expected. I know that honourable senators realize that it is proper to speak on the motion as well as on the amendment, when speaking on the amendment, but I want to make it clear that if I misled my learned friend, the Leader of the Opposition, in any way by warning him that Senator Lamontagne was going to ask for leave, and that he would not speak fully on both the motion and the amendment, then—

Senator Asselin: But he did.

Senator Frith: I knew that he was going to do so. If I misled the other side by suggesting that he would be saying less than that, I apologize for having done so. If it turns out that someone on the other side wishes, in the course of this debate or any other, to speak on an amendment and asks for leave to speak a second time, then I am sure that not only will it be received, I hope generously, but the comments of Senator Smith (Colchester) and other senators on the other side will be noted for that purpose.

Unless I have misunderstood the status of the matter, I believe that Senator Asselin has proposed the adjournment of the debate—which in itself is not a debatable motion. I draw that fact to the attention of honourable senators and would suggest that we are now in a position to move on to the next order of business.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 14, debate on the motion of Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche):

> That there be laid before this house copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications between the Minister and officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs during the year 1979, related to the banning of certain glass containers of carbonated drinks.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the wording of Senator Fournier's motion, which can be found on page iii of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for today, is as follows:

> That there be laid before this house copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications between the Minister and officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs during the year 1979, related to the banning of certain glass containers of carbonated drinks.

Honourable senators will recall that the minister took the position that the documents were privileged and should not be produced. Honourable senators will know that in connection with such claims the privilege is usually granted, with exceptions. I say usually granted, but there are exceptions. The position of the ministry to claim privilege in those circumstances is the subject of a fairly long line of precedents, the leading one being the case of Duncan v. Cammell Laird Company Limited.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) quite properly, in my opinion, said that he did not wish to withdraw his motion, which was a normal request. The normal procedure is that once the privilege is claimed, the person asking for the documents is asked to withdraw his motion, although he is not required to do so. Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) declined to withdraw his motion, and I then adjourned the debate.

Two things have happened in the meantime. Obviously Senator Fournier's motion, and his well-known position on this question, has come to the attention of the ministry—it must have or they would not have declined to produce the documents—and some action has been taken. The subject of that action is contained in a news release by the federal Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister, Mr. Ouellet. I have already furnished a copy in advance to Senator Fournier. I will explain to the house what is in it and I shall then ask for permission to table it. It says:

> Federal Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister André Ouellet today announced his intention of introducing regulations under the Hazardous Products Act which will allow the sale of 1.5-litre soft drink bottles of improved safety performance. The Minister stressed that the bottles must meet standards prescribed by his department and carry a warning label.
> Mr. Ouellet explained that under the regulations the soft drink industry will not be able to increase its supplies of the 1.5-litre bottle designs banned last year, and can market only those bottles which pass the department's combination of drop and drill tests. In addition, each bottle will have to carry a bilingual label stating, "Contents under pressure. Handle with care".
> The Canadian Soft Drink Association has stated that 1.5-litre bottles currently in stock can meet departmental standards if they are coated with a layer of plastic.

In addition, the industry's association has undertaken to initiate early action to improve current bottle designs so that future production will provide greater safety for consumers.

There is also the background paper. Might I ask honourable senators for leave to table this document, a copy of which was given in advance to Senator Fournier? The document is in both official languages.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith then tabled:

Copies of a News Release issued by the Office of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerning the sale of 1.5 litre soft drink bottles of improved safety performance.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, under those circumstances, I would ask Senator Fournier, in view of the privilege that was claimed and what—I say this by way of a footnote—may very well have been something that took place as a result of his efforts—perhaps including his refusal to withdraw his motion—whether he is now prepared to withdraw his motion, without, of course, any prejudice to introducing it at a later date if the steps that have been taken are found to be unsatisfactory.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, I should like to shed some more light on this motion. Yesterday I received a copy of a news release dated May 19. It is now June 12. That was the first time I took notice of this. I don't know who gave it to me, but today I received a copy in French. Apparently it is from the minister's office and is a replica of the English version, but I didn't have time to look at. I presume it is a copy of the same document.

Last evening I had time to deal with this and I found that we are not getting anywhere at all, according to my reading of it. I should like to point out a few things and ask a few questions before I submit to withdrawing my motion.

In the first place, the Leader of the Government in the Senate tables dozens of documents weekly. There is no war; there is no secrecy. It is just normal routine administration, and I cannot see why the leader cannot produce these documents.

Knowing that the previous minister's knowledge on soft drink bottles was as poor as mine, I think surely he must have been guided by others. This involves Pepsi-Cola, Coca-Cola, Dr. Pepper, Schweppes, 7-Up, Sprite, Canada Dry, Orange Crush, Pure Spring and others. I am just giving the highlights, because I know time is pressing. It involves three Canadian bottle manufacturers and a Japanese manufacturer who has ambitions to build a plant in Toronto or somewhere in Canada.

Coca-Cola produced rubber rings on bottles which passed three consecutive times, yet that was not accepted. This concerns the consumer and retail prices, and there is no mention about layoffs or anything of that sort.

[Senator Frith.]

Coming back to the news release, I note that it is difficult—and I learned this from 20 years of experience in the House of Commons and in the Senate—for a government employee to admit he is wrong after a mistake is found. Reversing a decision is sometimes painful, and I can tell you about a few cases in that regard.

I should like to know why this news release was produced May 16, and who advised the producers. They didn't know anything except what they read in the papers. They are not free to promote sales because everything is frozen awaiting ministerial decision. This has been going on for almost a month.

The press release states:

The Canadian Soft Drink Association has stated that 1.5-litre bottles currently in stock can meet departmental standards if they are coated with a layer of plastic.

That is impossible. All these bottles would have to be emptied and transported from Moncton, to Montreal, then shipped back to Moncton plastic coated. That is just impossible. The cost would not permit it. So whoever made that suggestion didn't know too much about what he was talking about.

On page 2 of this paper it says that they made a study of bottles exploding. I should like to know the difference between an explosion and a breakage due to mishandling. In my studies, very few bottles exploded but some were damaged by mishandling.

The news release mentions a multi-million dollar investment in bottles and filling equipment. I agree with that statement, but there is nothing mentioned about the massive layoffs.

The release further states:

Because the hazard level of 1.5-litre torpedo-shaped bottles was significantly higher than nearly all bottles of a different design or size, the soft-drink industry was urged in June 1979 to remove them from the marketplace on a voluntary basis.

By whom? That is another question.

As far as the bottling people were concerned, the timing was definitely wrong. In the month of June the warehouses are usually full, because this industry does a lot of business in June, July and August. This was a bad time to urge these people to do that on a voluntary basis. That request failed because most of the producers had no warning except that they received a telegram of some sort saying that as of midnight there would be no more sales.

The release talks about torpedo-shaped bottles that failed, but it doesn't talk about Champagne bottles, beer bottles, whiskey bottles, ketchup bottles, vinegar bottles, or whatever, which, if dropped on the floor, are likely to break and do break.

This news release talks about what takes place in Japan, Spain, Germany and Holland. It talks about a drill test and a drop test. I know something about the drop test, but this is the first time I have heard of a drill test. I should like to know what it is.

• (1540)

Now, I would like to bring to the attention of the deputy leader the fact that the last paragraph seems to distort or destroy everything that has gone before. So I definitely want an explanation of that. It could be that I am simply not understanding what it means, but let me read it to you:

> Although the regulations will permit the marketing of modified 1.5-litre soft drink bottles that meet tests to be conducted by the department's Product Safety Branch, the addition to inventories of bottles of current design, as now banned, will not be permitted.

To me that destroys everything that has been done before. What is a "modified" bottle? Is there some suggestion that all of the bottles that are now on the shelves will have to be emptied and sent back to some factory somewhere to be modified—for instance, be coated and refilled? That is far from clear.

Just to put my questions again briefly, why has there been so much delay since this was released on May 16? What is the situation with respect to bottles exploding and the mishandling of bottles? Is there a connection? Why was the rubber ring that passed the test not accepted on a temporary basis?

With respect to the task force that has been mentioned, I would like to know whether the members of the task force are from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or whether it would include anyone from the production lines involved.

Again, I would like an explanation of that last paragraph in order to understand what they mean by "modified . . . soft drink bottles" and the expression "will not be permitted."

Until I have the answers to those questions I will not withdraw my request.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I regret that I am unable to answer the questions put by Senator Fournier. I would suggest that those questions could be answered, if he were to put them to the department. If they were not prepared to answer them, he could call for an inquiry and we could discuss the matter further in the Senate.

I can only say, however, that I cannot answer his questions and I must at this point draw the attention of honourable senators to the motion or the matter that is actually before us, which is separate and apart from those questions. In saying that, I am not in any way suggesting that Senator Fournier's questions are not valid or that they should not be answered. Indeed, I make no comment on that one way or the other.

The point we must consider is whether certain documents, which are copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications between the minister and the officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs during the year 1979, should be laid before the house. That is the substance of the actual motion.

Whether I support his reasons or not, I understand why Senator Fournier does not wish to withdraw; but his having said a second time that he will not withdraw, I think that in order to deal with the specific item, which is much narrower than the questions raised by Senator Fournier just now, the question should be put whether or not these documents should be laid on the Table.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It seems to me that the deputy leader is showing a certain unwarranted inflexibility in the circumstances. Surely it would be easy for him to ask the minister responsible if he could provide the answers to the questions put by Senator Fournier today. If so, Senator Fournier would no doubt withdraw his request and that would obviate the necessity of having the Senate say either yes or no to this motion.

I suggest to Senator Frith that he try to obtain the answers. If that fails, then we could follow the course he has suggested.

Senator Frith: I understand and appreciate that suggestion and I will undertake to forward a transcript of the comments and questions placed on the record today by Senator Fournier and see what answers we receive to them. In the meantime, with respect, I would like to have this item cleared up.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Frith: Because the question we are looking at is not whether the ministry should give these answers but whether they should put the documents on the table. That is purely a procedural question. As I have said, I am prepared to undertake to see that these comments and questions by Senator Fournier are drawn to the attention of the minister and I will try to obtain answers. In the meantime I should like to deal with this pure question of privilege—

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of privilege.

Senator Frith: It is not a question of privilege in this chamber. It is a question of privilege in the legal sense of the term.

Senator Flynn: We do not have to force a decision of the Senate on that question now. If you were simply to let the motion stand for another ten days, for instance, you could in the meantime obtain the answers to the questions and probably they would be withdrawn upon receipt of the answers without necessitating the Senate's making a decision on that.

Senator Frith: I much prefer not to tie this motion to the questions, honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: You are not tying it to anything.

Senator Frith: With respect, that is exactly what we are doing. We are saying that the question of whether this correspondence should be furnished or not is to turn on whether or not satisfactory answers are given. I am undertaking to try to obtain those answers, but I submit, with respect, that standing the matter will not change anything because the ministry will not say, "We have given the answers and now we are going to put the correspondence on the Table." That issue is quite apart from the question of whether they can get answers to this.

Senator Flynn: We understand.

Senator Frith: That is why I am asking that the question be put.

Senator Flynn: In that case I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: That is fine.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 17, at 8 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the McDonnell Douglas Corporation Incorporated in the State of Maryland, United States of America, dated April 16, 1980, respecting the purchase of the CF-18 Aircraft.

Report of Agreements made under the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 7 of the said Act, Chapter A-6, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, dated May 27, 1980, respecting certain Acts which established superannuation or pension funds or plans for members of the public service of Canada, pursuant to section 47(2) of the Canadian Human Rights Act, Chapter 33, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Could I ask my honourable friend if it is the intention to refer the document on the McDonnell Douglas Corporation to the subcommittee on defence, for examination?

Senator Perrault: The senator has advanced an idea that should be the subject of discussion. Perhaps the matter can be considered.

PROHIBITION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-7, to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

PYRAMID COMMUNICATIONS LIMITED—FIRST READING

Hon. Lionel Choquette presented Bill S-8, to revive Pyramid Communications Limited.

Bill read first time.

Senator Choquette moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 17, 1980

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its second report as follows:

In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, and to its further reference set out in its first report of this session and approved by both Houses on June 4, 1980 empowering the committee to conduct a comprehensive study of the means by which Parliament can better oversee the government regulatory process, your committee recommends:

That it be given authority to attend a conference on the scrutiny of delegated legislation in Canberra, Australia, from September 29 to October 3, 1980; and

That your committee or its subcommittees and members of your committee have the power, when your committee deems it necessary, to adjourn or travel from place to place inside or outside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the required staff accompany your committee, subcommittees or members of your committee, as the case may be.

Respectfully submitted,

John M. Godfrey
Joint Chairman

Senator Godfrey moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Last week I undertook to inform honourable senators of the program for our sitting in the next week or two. Perhaps honourable senators would like to look at their calendars. They will remember that St. Jean Baptiste Day falls on June 24, Tuesday of next week. It is our suggestion that we not sit on June 23 or 24, the Monday and Tuesday. We will sit on Wednesday evening, June 25. This will give those from the east and west an opportunity to arrive in Ottawa on Wednesday, Although I should say that committee meetings will take place on Wednesday afternoon. I know that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will sit on Wednesday afternoon. Before this week is through, you may receive notices of other meetings for next Wednesday.

• (2010)

We propose to sit on Thursday, June 26, at 2 o'clock. We are constrained to ask you to hold open the morning of Friday, June 27, as it might be necessary to sit then. I will advise you, if possible by the end of this week but more likely early next week, whether we will have sufficient business to require us to sit on the morning of June 27. My opinion, based on the amount of business I know of at this moment, is that we will likely sit on the morning of June 27. Royal assent may also be required that day.

The plan, then, would be not to sit during the week of June 30. Dominion Day, or Canada Day, falls on Tuesday, July 1, and we would plan not to sit on July 2, 3 or 4. It is our opinion at this time that if we sit for the three days in the previous week, we will not be required to be here that week at all for Senate sittings. Then we propose to sit again on Tuesday, July 8, as usual at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DROUGHT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—CHARGES FOR USE OF HOPPER CARS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am not sure if this is the right place or not, but with leave of the Senate I should like to make an announcement at this time.

Senator Flynn: For you, we will always give leave.

Senator Choquette: If it is not the right place, it is the right day.

Senator Argue: The announcement is as follows:

The federal government and the Canadian Wheat Board have decided to drop the fee normally charged on the use of grain hopper cars moving grain screenings and other livestock feeds on the back-haul from Thunder Bay to Manitoba and Saskatchewan, but CP Rail seems unable to pass on that freight saving to shippers using the hopper cars for that purpose.

I am asking the railway to reconsider its position in the light of serious drought conditions existing in Saskatchewan and Manitoba where feed for livestock is in critically short supply.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Because this year's severe drought in Manitoba and Saskatchewan is hitting livestock producers especially hard—some are already beginning to deplete their herds because of a lack of feed—the Government of Canada and the Canadian Wheat Board have decided to drop the usual 7.5 cent per car mile charge for use of our 10,000 hopper cars in moving a needed feed like the Thunder Bay screenings for use in this emergency on the prairies.

We want the railways to pass this saving along to the shippers who will be transporting the screenings in order to reduce the actual cost to the farmers in the west who desperately need this feed supply and are already facing high costs in coping with the drought situation.

If CP Rail cannot cut its freight charges to save the shippers 7.5 cents per car mile, the fee would have to be collected in the usual manner, but the government and the board would then rebate an appropriate amount back to the shippers to ensure that the actual cost of screenings to drought-striken livestock producers will be kept to the absolute minimum. The administrative burden would be borne by the government and the board.

• (2015)

Our decision to cut the cost of backhauling screenings from Thunder Bay by 7½ cents per car mile is a further step by the Government of Canada to help farmers cope with this very serious drought situation.

As the days go by and the severe dry conditions persist, the federal cabinet will have before it additional measures which we shall consider taking. Timely general rains are the only perfect solution, but the Government of Canada stands ready to assist in this emergency in every practical way.

The major impact of the drought so far has been upon the livestock industry, although grain and oilseed crops are also suffering from a lack of moisture. Grain producers are at least partially protected against drought problems by the federal Crop Insurance Program and by the Western Grain Stabilization Plan.

DROUGHT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—BARLEY SUPPLIES FOR LIVESTOCK

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I might also at this time read into Hansard an announcement I made yesterday.

Senator Flynn: Where did you make it?

Senator Argue: Here in Ottawa. The announcement was as follows:

> I am asking the Canadian Wheat Board to arrange for the immediate issuance of import permits for feed grains. There is now a desperate need to have barley readily available to livestock producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Alberta, I might say, has had very timely rains, as a result of which Albertans feel they do not have a very severe drought. My announcement continues:

Prairie elevator stocks of barley, both Canadian Wheat Board and non-board, are low, totalling only some 17.5 million bushels. On-farm stocks of barley in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which total about 55 million bushels, should be adequate. However, it is clear that many livestock producers need their own supplies for their own cattle and that the considerable existing surplus is being held off the market until prices rise.

In view of this emergency, and the need to save the basic livestock herd, I am today asking the Canadian Wheat Board to arrange immediately for the issuing of permits for the importation of barley from the United States. My information is that there are more than sufficient stocks available in the northern states and that it can be purchased at reasonable prices.

These imports will obviously relieve the immediate and critical shortage for many livestock owners, and may very well have the second beneficial effect of helping to free up barley stocks held on prairie farms. I have taken this action, rather than following through on the suggestion that feed grain shipments off the prairies be embargoed, as it is preferable to forcing the Canadian Wheat Board and the private trade to break their contracts in the domestic and export markets.

This action will be further to the steps already taken by the Canadian Wheat Board to stop selling barley into the eastern market and to make available at country elevators its stocks of barley at corn competitive prices.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the minister would allow me to make a few comments on the statements he has just made.

Senator Flynn: Whether he agrees or not, go ahead.

Senator Roblin: My honourable leader tells me I have to do it anyway, and I always do what he tells me, so here goes.

I must say I had been hoping that we would hear some more from the minister tonight, because the measures that have been announced to date do not commend themselves to me as being commensurate with the problem. In connection with livestock in particular, the drought is particularly oppressive. With respect to field crops, the excellent crop insurance program pioneered some years ago by the Government of Manitoba has proved to be very useful.

Senator Marshall: Who was the premier at the time?

Senator Roblin: Modesty almost prevents me from saying that Manitoba beat the federal government and Saskatchewan in introducing a workable crop insurance program, and it is still the best in the country.

Senator Argue: Who was the premier at the time?

Senator Roblin: It is my birthday today, so I do not think I will tell you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: In 1961 we had a similar situation to that which exists today. I recall that the federal government then was considerably more active in dealing with the matter than the present government has been. For example, the then Minister of Agriculture himself went to the prairies and convened a meeting of the prairie Ministers of Agriculture and concerted their programs very well indeed. At that time they decided to make sure that water aquifers were identified throughout the prairies and that the water supply points were located so that we could then know what the water resources were.

• (2020)

What bothers me at the present time is that the livestock markets in Winnipeg are handling about double the number of livestock they normally would at this time. It indicates the considerable pressure the livestock industry is under. I can freely predict that at this time next year we will see that reflected in the price of beef in no uncertain way. The $7 million, which is the sum referred to in this minister's release, strikes me as being certainly the very minimum that could be allocated in this respect. In my opinion, it is far from adequate.

I should like to put on record with respect to Manitoba that precipitation this spring has been most difficult indeed. In the Portage la Prairie area, which is usually the garden of the province, precipitation has been 9.9 since the first of April, compared to 127.9 normal. So it is far less than 10. Around Winnipeg it is 7.8 compared to 116. In Brandon it is 16.8 compared to 109. In Morden it is 19.0 compared to 121. Dauphin is somewhat better: 30.6 compared to 111.4. When you consider that the rainfall prior to the first of April was also gravely deficient, you can get some idea of the probable depth of the situation we are encountering there. I predict that, crop insurance or no crop insurance, it will be slim pickings on the Manitoba prairies in the next few months. That will be true not only for the farmers but for everybody who does business with them. I think the minister will agree with me on that. Probably the same remarks could be made about eastern Saskatchewan as well.

I should like to know from the minister not only what plans he has to move feed to livestock, which I agree is necessary, but also what possibilities he has explored with respect to moving livestock to feed. In a sense that sounds like the wrong way to go about it, but there is a case to be made that, where there are adequate supplies of pasture in eastern Canada and other places, which I believe is the case, one can foresee the desirability of moving livestock, perhaps on their way to eastern markets, but certainly to eastern areas, to where they can be fed and fattened, rather than be left to the slaughter houses on the prairies. That would be a good investment in the price of beef, to say nothing else insofar as the consumer is concerned. So I say to the minister that his program is about as skimpy as one can get. If he is able and willing to give us some advance on this in the next few days it will be welcomed in the west.

Senator Argue: Before I reply to the remarks by the honourable Senator Roblin, I wish to congratulate him on his birthday. I am sure he is one of the most able senators we have, one of the most congenial and one who makes an outstanding contribution in this chamber.

I want to acknowledge that the statements he made about crop insurance in Manitoba in years gone by are factual. He can take a good deal of credit, and justifiable credit, for pioneering the crop insurance scheme. And it is a good one! Fifty per cent of the benefits are contributed by the farmer, and 50 per cent by the federal treasury. The provinces administer the act in each province, and the administration cost is something around 8 per cent. So it is a good investment from the standpoint of a provincial government. I know they would not say it in Manitoba, or at least they might not say it, but in Saskatchewan someone might say that the NDP machine had followed an earlier Liberal machine when it came to dealing with crop insurance benefits or PFA. At any rate, it is a very good program.

I appreciate what Senator Roblin has said, namely, that in his judgment the amounts in the federal program—the present program; the one that has just been announced—of approximately $7 million represent a conservative figure. That assures us the support of the opposition in having this figure increased if and when the need arises. I hope the need will not arise, which would mean that the rains had come. In discussion with the Ministers of Agriculture of both Manitoba and Saskatchewan, I believe it is fair to say that they considered this to be a reasonable amount at this time. Events will decide whether or not the figure should be supplemented.

I should point out that the information I have on the last major drought problem in 1977 indicates that only $1 million was spent on a program that had about the same application. However, the rains came early and the program was discontinued within a comparatively short period.

The honourable senator asked whether in this program, in addition to the sharing of costs involved in the moving of feed to livestock, there should be a provision for payment for the movement of cattle to pasture. That provision is in the program. The federal government is prepared to share those costs.

With regard to the agreements—and here I do not want to put up any barriers, because there are none—they will need to be signed by both the federal and provincial governments. I have seen draft copies of the agreements. The Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, in a telephone conversation with me, said that he felt the points were satisfactory. If there are any points that are weak, representation can be made to us as to how they should be strengthened. I am sure I speak not only for myself but also for my colleagues when I say that we shall be very happy to consider any recommendations on how the program can be improved.

The announcements that I have made indicate that the federal government is taking initiatives in its own right, and will continue to take initiatives insofar as it considers they can be helpful. My own view is that one of the announcements that I made tonight—namely, that starting today the Canadian Wheat Board will issue permits for the purchase of barley from producers in the United States, to be transported to Canada for feeding to our livestock—is a very good measure. The fact is that there are substantial stocks of barley in the hands of producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, but the producers are hanging on to their supplies, and the percentage of barley in the elevators is really a small percentage of the amount that is on the farms.

[Senator Roblin.]

It has been recommended to me that there should be an embargo on all shipments of barley from the prairies to eastern Canada. It was said that it should be only non-board, and when I said that we cannot have one rule applying to private trade, or the non-board grains, and another applying to the Wheat Board, the reply was that we should apply it to everyone. But that would have been a desperate measure, because it would have said to the private trade and to the Canadian Wheat Board that the Government of Canada was taking action to force them to break their contracts.

In my view, this system of allowing purchases of barley in the United States to come into a feed-short province such as Manitoba and Saskatchewan is better. It will not only have the beneficial effect of bringing in extra supplies of barley, it is my guess that the secondary effect may be to free up some of those stocks that are on farms in both Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Senator Roblin: The honourable minister is so agreeable tonight that I hardly feel like pursuing the matter any further. It is no part of my intention that anyone should proceed with the mandatory measures he has just outlined to the house. I think it would be a mistake to do so. My own feeling is, from having some experience, that while one can reasonably expect farmers to retain enough barley and other livestock feed for their own use, there is a pretty free and easy and neighbourly attitude toward the need of others. I would really be surprised if we did not find a good deal of co-operative support among farmers on the prairies after, quite naturally, their own requirements had been met. The minister would probably agree with that statement.

I do not like to go back to crop insurance—we have beaten it to death—but when we started the federal government was not in for a five-cent piece; they did not come in for some time, but I am glad that they are there now. Not more than once or twice have I ever looked a gift horse in the mouth. The point that I really want to make to the minister is that I appreciate his invitation to suggest how the measures his government has adopted can be improved upon, and if I have any constructive suggestions he can rely on me to produce them.

Senator Argue: I agree that most farmers are generous and want to help their neighbours, but the odd time one of them wants to make a dollar when he can avail himself of that opportunity. The information I have been given is that, after canvassing Saskatchewan very widely, the listing service of the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture had only 20,000 bushels of barley, which is really only a drop in the bucket; so that something desperate had to be done, and I hope that this procedure I have announced today is working.

My information is that during this day alone—I do not have the exact total—permits covering the importation from the U.S.A. of some millions of bushels of barley have been issued, and this barley will be brought into Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government dealing with the rapidly expiring energy agreement with the producing provinces.

I wonder if the leader could tell us if the understanding that I have is a correct one, namely, that the minister responsible for this department in Alberta has said that the federal ministry has agreed to increase the price but has not agreed to offer the other benefits or offsets which were offered by the previous administration. It appears that this is not an offer that is acceptable to the Government of Alberta. I wonder if the leader could tell us if this is to be the firm position of the Government of Canada in dealing with the energy-producing provinces, or whether there is a chance of getting an interim agreement. Obviously we need an interim agreement if we are going to work towards a long-term agreement.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, every effort is being made to resolve outstanding differences with the Province of Alberta with respect to oil pricing. I want to reiterate, however, that the Liberal energy package is not identical with the one which was proposed and under development by the previous government.

It is my understanding that the honourable senator's information is correct. The Honourable Merv Leitch of Alberta has stated that an offer has been made by the federal government. Indeed, I understand that a note of hope was sounded in his statement made in recent hours.

Senator Roblin: Let us hope so.

Senator Doody: As a supplementary, honourable senators, with regard to that note of hope, I observe that the Honourable Mr. Leitch also indicated that in his opinion serious negotiations had not yet taken place. This is a matter of concern to all of us, of course, because all of us will be affected by the energy pricing situation of eastern Canada, western Canada and the whole country. Mr. Leitch indicated that the two meetings that had been held over the past four months did not indicate, in his opinion, serious negotiations. I understand that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the apostle of peace, order and good government, the quiet man, will be leaving the country for 10 days. Is someone going to carry on in his absence in order to bring this set of negotiations to an amicable solution?

• (2040)

Senator Perrault: I know honourable senators are aware that this is a difficult negotiation. It was a difficult negotiation for the previous government which, at the time it left office, had still not concluded this negotiation with the oil-producing provinces. No one should regard this as a negotiation where solutions may be found easily. However, an effort is being made to achieve an equitable price arrangement. An effort is being made to ensure an adequate supply of oil to all sectors of Canada.

If the honourable senator has some constructive suggestions to make to the government as to how his political associates in the province of Alberta can be accommodated, I hope he will make these suggestions available to the government as speedily as possible.

Senator Doody: I would be only too happy to make one very positive suggestion right now, and that is that we offer Alberta a price at the same level as we are offering the Government of Mexico. That might be a start in the right direction, and I offer that as a suggestion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Or even the proposal of last year.

Senator Doody: Having done my little bit from the opposition benches to help the Government of Canada in this dilemma in which it finds itself, I now continue with a supplementary question. Canadian consumers are obviously in a very serious quandary. They do not know if these negotiations that are taking place can lead to a one-three or six-month agreement, or even a five-year agreement. The minister in Alberta has given us a ray of hope, or a token of light; can we expect some positive statement from the Government of Canada to take some of the uncertainty out of consumers' minds, at least in the short term if not in the long term?

Senator Perrault: Every effort is being made to develop a comprehensive policy. May I quote from the Honourable Marc Lalonde, who has undertaken the onerous responsibility to negotiate with the first ministers and other ministers in the provinces. He said:

> Economically, looking ahead, Canadians have every reason for optimism. We have barely begun to tap oil and gas in our Arctic and off-shore territories. If we can survive politically, we can, in not too many years, be the strongest democracy in the world. And we can survive if we realize that our fortune and our freedoms hinge on our interdependence.

This is the spirit which motivates the negotiations with the provinces—the spirit that we are all members of the Canadian family. Some sections of the family are enjoying better fortune than others, but in the spirit of the family we share our benefits and we share our difficulties, and we attempt to keep the family united and strong in the process.

Senator Doody: I thank the leader for the latest quotation from the "Gospel of St. Marc" but I am afraid it is scant consolation to the people in eastern and western Canada who are looking for a long-term solution to their problems, which are appearing to be dealt with in isolation from the constitutional question.

Senator Donahoe: Is that the same quotation the minister used when he purported to have all the answers when he went to the country?

Senator Doody: I don't think we are allowed to mention the election; it is a very sore and sensitive point.

Senator Perrault: I would think you would like to forget it.

Senator Doody: In all honesty, I certainly would. I wish it had never taken place, and all the people of Canada feel the same way.

I would ask the leader if he could give us a more definite answer than he has just given. I appreciate the quotation and I love the sentiment and, but for the absence of the organ and the music of the gypsy violin player, it was a very touching scene. However, can he give us something more concrete than that?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope to bring to the chamber a statement on energy policy very shortly. In the meantime, we can all welcome the generosity of spirit exemplified in those remarks by the Honourable Marc Lalonde.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ARTILLERY SYSTEMS—PARTICIPATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION (QUEBEC)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Previously I asked a question concerning disarmament. I now discover that the Government of Canada is co-sponsoring a secret conference on armament and improvement of artillery, to which has been invited Space Research Corporation, which was fined in the United States yesterday, and the founder of which was sentenced to jail for providing armaments to South Africa. Is the government giving consideration to withdrawing its sponsorship of this particular group and its invitation to take part in the high-level meeting next week to be held in the Conference Centre?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I understand, honourable senators, that this conference has something to do with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. However, the facts will be ascertained and information brought to the Senate as quickly as possible.

Senator Macquarrie: Perhaps in the process it might be possible to have an examination made of an interesting view of justice. I have a quotation from an officer of the Department of Supply and Services which reads as follows:

[Senator Perrault.]

> We didn't think with Bull's connections that he would go to jail.

This is an interesting reflection of someone's view of the legal system.

Senator Perrault: Would the honourable senator give the source of that intriguing quotation?

Senator Macquarrie: That was an extremely good adjective to use. It is from a Canadian Press story by Gerard McNeil, and I quote:

> "We didn't think with Bull's connections that he would go to jail," an official of the Supply and Services Department said in another interview.

I believe that will be in the daily paper tomorrow. My research was a little faster than someone else's.

Senator Perrault: Does the honourable senator have the name of the publication and the page number? I am not trying to harass him, but it is a rather interesting quotation and I would appreciate any information he could provide, perhaps privately, with respect to the matter.

Senator Macquarrie: I have fully digested this, and I will be happy to send a copy to the leader. My final, succinct, laconic question is: Given that the Space Research Corporation in the United States has already been found guilty, and that the case in Canada is still under judicial consideration, and given that violation of the United Nation's ban against South Africa is a clear breach of international law, will the leader make the strongest representations possible to his colleagues that no further federal funds be provided to the Space Research Corporation until the allegations against the company in Canada are either proven or rejected in a court of law?

Senator Perrault: An inquiry will go forward immediately.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my question is for Senator Olson, the Minister of State for Economic Development. Has the minister either seen the Sunday program called Question Period on the CTV network or read a transcript of the remarks by the Honourable Marc Lalonde in which, I am informed, the minister said that the package proposed by the present administration was identical to that proposed by the previous government?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I did not see the program and I have not read a transcript of it, so if that is the premise of the question I would not be able to answer directly. I would probably have some difficulty in answering questions with respect to that in any event because, as the honourable senator knows, there will be another very important meeting tomorrow between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for the federal government and the minister responsible from the Government of Alberta. I would not comment one way or another on what they will be discussing. They will report that to the Houses of Parliament and it will be public information when they are ready.

Senator Nurgitz: Without interfering with the negotiations, which I am sure are important and sensitive, the simple question is: Did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of the present administration say on a television program on Sunday last that the package proposed by this administration is identical to that proposed by the previous government?

Senator Olson: I have some notes in front of me that I have not had time to read. As I say, I did not see the program and I did not read the transcript. Therefore, I am not an authority on what took place. However, if the honourable gentleman would like me to do some of his homework for him, I would be glad to try to get the transcript and he can read it for himself.

● (2050)

Senator Nurgitz: Fair enough.

Senator Flynn: That is not your homework.

Senator Nurgitz: I will accept the offer of the minister to do my homework and get back to the first question as to what was said or not said.

Senator Olson: The answer is very simple. I don't know. I didn't see it. I haven't read a transcript of it.

Senator Nurgitz: The offer was that you would do my homework and report back as to what was said, and I accept the offer.

Senator Olson: And I accept that I have made that offer to you.

TRANSPORT

DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHEASTERN BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL FIELDS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government and arises out of his announcement, as reported in yesterday's Vancouver Sun, to the effect that the federal government is still "massively involved" in the development of the northeastern British Columbia coal fields.

The minister is quoted as having said that Ottawa will spend $210 million on eight new coal trains for CNR; $75 million to upgrade the main line between Prince Rupert and Prince George, and more than $100 million to develop the port of Prince Rupert.

Will the minister confirm that this is, in fact, a commitment of funds from the federal treasury and explain how this is to be carried out?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am very pleased to make a statement with respect to the proposed northeast coal development in British Columbia.

First of all, the two levels of government, provincial and federal, have worked over a period of four years to ascertain whether there is the possibility to develop on a commercially viable basis certain extensive metallurgical coal resources in the northeastern part of the province of British Columbia.

Market conditions have advanced to the point where there appears to be at the least a possibility that substantial amounts of this large coal resource can be sold in the Japanese market. It is anticipated that initially something in excess of 5 million tonnes per year could be sold there if an adequate price can be obtained from the Japanese buyers. Indeed, there are indications that there could be a need in the Japanese market for at least an additional 5 million tonnes of northeast B.C. metallurgical coal—perhaps 7 million tonnes a year.

As I have said, for four years the two levels of government have worked together on a co-operative basis to determine whether this huge coal resource can be brought into profitable production. This co-operation has involved cost-shared studies and surveys. Contrary to certain public reports, the recent series of negotiations has been conducted in the same co-operative spirit. Of course, there has been tough and vigorous bargaining on both sides as there is in most matters relating to federal-provincial relations.

On Thursday and during the early hours of Friday last we had a conference in Ottawa involving ministers and officials from the federal government as well as from the Province of British Columbia, the CNR, the National Harbours Board, and the coal companies. We achieved an agreement in principle at that meeting.

May I describe the degree and type of proposed and agreed federal government involvement? First of all it is anticipated that it will be necessary to upgrade the Canadian National rail link between Prince George and Prince Rupert to an extent of $60 million to $90 million. It is difficult to come down with precise estimates at this point, but the expenditure should be within that range. This rail upgrading will be necessary, of course, because of the substantially increased tonnages of coal flowing from northeast development. This upgrading will be in addition to upgrading required to transport other commodities, including increased wheat tonnages from the prairie provinces.

The important point here is that in this area of federal responsibility there will be a large investment of funds up front in the near future—from $60 million to $90 million—in order to make this project go ahead. With its national responsibility for ports, the agreement calls for substantial new federal investment, through the National Harbours Board, in the port of Prince Rupert. It is anticipated that the National Harbours Board will invest at least $35 million for site preparation for the new coal terminal at Ridley Island. In addition, the National Harbours Board will have to call tenders to construct a new coal terminal which will be a multi-million dollar project costing, perhaps, $60 million; indeed, as much as $75 million. In other words, in terms of federal investment, or investment under federal supervision in the Port of Prince Rupert, there could be another $95 million; indeed, as much as $110 million.

Again, these figures are only approximate, but they are knowledgeable "guesstimates."

In addition to this federal participation through the CNR and the NHB, the federal government offered to the Province of British Columbia a further investment amount of $70 million, an investment in the infrastructure necessary to establish the rail link from the coal fields to existent B.C. rail trackage leading to Prince George. It was agreed at the Ottawa meeting, however, that the $70 million federal offer would be applied to the non-rail sections of the infrastructure—townsites, roads, power lines, and so on.

This was agreed to on Thursday night and Friday morning last. It should be noted, honourable senators, that at this meeting the CNR representatives stated that if they were given the responsibility to build the infrastructure rail link from the coal fields they would invest something like $210 million in new rolling stock equipment. This $210 million would be spent to acquire eight unit coal trains to get those large coal tonnages to the west coast, and that again would have been a federal investment through the CNR.

At the Thursday-Friday meeting in Ottawa it was agreed that, with the exception of the CNR involvement in the rail infrastructure, all of these points would form part of the federal involvement in the proposed project, the details of which would be resolved the following day here in Ottawa. The British Columbia government in turn—

Senator Marshall: Answer the question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I was asked to put this on the record and I am pleased to do so.

The British Columbia government in turn stated that they would build the rail infrastructure through their entity, B.C. Rail. This was entirely a decision of the B. C. government. The B.C. government decided, unilaterally, that the higher-cost Anzac route would be followed. The choice of the rail developer and the route were exclusive decisions of the Province of British Columbia. It should be noted and repeated that at the Ottawa meeting, British Columbia proposed that the federal investment of $70 million go toward the establishment of community and other services in northeastern British Columbia. Despite the Ottawa agreement, we were advised on Friday morning that certain sections of the accord "must be ratified by the full provincial cabinet."

At the British Columbia cabinet meeting on Saturday morning—I am almost to the conclusion of my statement—in Vancouver, it was decided that the Province of British Columbia would not accept the federal offer of $70 million to be invested in the non-rail infrastructure. That was a policy reversal made by the Province of British Columbia. We accept that policy decision. They certainly had the right to make that decision.

It should be made clear, however, that both levels of government felt that if a sufficiently high price could be obtained for the coal, the project could be a viable one and that with the assistance of public "front-end" money, the coal development could repay this taxpayer investment. On that basis, both governments agreed that cost recovery, however it is done, should be part of any assistance package. That, too, was part of the agreement. This project must be a good deal for the taxpayer—a good deal or "no deal".

Honourable senators, this is where the situation stands today. I think both levels of government look forward to working together with the CNR, with BC Rail, with the National Harbours Board, with the private companies and other entities in order to develop a very important Canadian resource. Of course, whether or not this development goes ahead will depend upon whether this coal can be sold at a viable, economically sound price on the Japanese market. The Canadian taxpayer should not be involved in the process of, in effect, subsidizing the Japanese steel industry, or providing unjustifiable subsidies to any one private sector group in this country.

Senator Murray: I must be very careful in putting my supplementary question. God forbid that any supplementary question of mine should invite another verbal avalanche at our innocent heads. I should like to ask this for the purposes of clarification. Are these expenditures contemplated by the CNR of approximately $210 million for the new coal trains and the $75 million to upgrade the main line to be made by the CNR as part of its regular capital program without any subsidy from the federal government?

Senator Perrault: Yes, these would be part of the CNR's regular capital program. This has always been made clear in our negotiations and in public statements. However, this money is "up front". This investment would be recaptured over a period of years. These capital expenditures would be "amortized" over a period of time on behalf of the taxpayers of this country, and I know the honourable senator would not question that policy. With respect to the $210 million investment in equipment, it has yet to be determined now, in view of the fact that BC Rail will build the rail infrastructure whether BC Rail will undertake this equipment investment, whether the CNR will undertake the equipment investment, or whether both railway companies will be involved in the equipment purchase jointly.

Senator Murray: In any case, there is no question of any subsidy from the federal treasury in respect of these expenditures?

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Murray: Is it correct to say that this expenditure by the National Harbours Board of approximately $100 million contemplated to upgrade the port of Prince Rupert will be made also as a strictly commercial venture on the part of the National Harbours Board without any subsidy from the federal treasury?

Senator Perrault: We are looking at the figures now. There may be some additional contribution necessary by the federal government to produce a competitive "through-put" rate in the initial stages. All of the implications are being considered. However, I understand the figures indicate that "down the line" it will be possible for the taxpayer to recapture his investment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to express the hope that when we are selling energy outside the borders of our country we get what it is worth.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: And it should not involve subsidies on our part. However, there is a difference, I suggest, between getting what it is worth and perhaps asking a little too much. The reason I make the point is that I am given to understand from the reports that have reached me that the reason why the Province of British Columbia declined the assistance of the federal government in building a rail link from the Sukunka Field to the main line was because of the insistence of the Canadian National Railways on a return of 20 per cent on their investment on a pay-off of fifteen years. Could the Leader of the Government tells us if that statement is correct with respect to the pricing policy of the Canadian National Railways?

Senator Perrault: It seems to me that the spokesmen for Canadian National Railways are in an excellent position to answer for themselves with respect to any policies they may have regarding rail development in British Columbia or in any other province. May I say that, from the figures produced by CNR at the hearings, they did not seem to vary from usual railway practice with respect to developments of this kind. The CNR representatives came to the negotiations at 4:00 o'clock on Thursday afternoon; they provided their views for all present and then they waited outside of the negotiating room for ten hours, available to discuss and presumably to negotiate any changes in their proposal. Perhaps they may have been prepared to consider the possibility of amortizing their capital costs over a longer period of time, thus reducing the proposed "per tonne" construction surcharge, or discussing the possibility of federal and provincial financial assistance to reduce the "per tonne', transport levies. There were no negotiations with CNR because the Province of British Columbia decided during the period of the talks that they would rather have their own entity do the construction.

Senator Roblin: I think it is probably inadvisable for the honourable senator to decline to discuss the CNR's position, if that is what he intends to do, because as principal bargainer on behalf of the federal authorities he is surely aware of all the components that go into this proposition, and this is certainly a very important one. I would suggest to him that the reason why the Province of British Columbia declined the offer for the CNR to build it is precisely because the pay-out is too fast. It results, I believe, in a price of $9 a ton for that particular segment of the transportation cost alone.

Bearing in mind the total cost of transporting the fuel to the seacoast, the disadvantages that Canadian producers struggle under because they are so far from the ocean compared with their competitors in Australia and elsewhere, the transportation segment of the pricing becomes very important. I think the British Columbia government decided that it would be reasonable to extend the period of amortization from 15 years to 20 years, which would certainly make a very substantial difference in the price.

I suggest to the Leader of the Government that, if he is really anxious to promote the development of these resources, it is necessary not only to be realistic in terms of recovering the costs, but not try to recover them too fast. I am not standing here as an expert in this matter, but it does seem to me that a 20 per cent pay-off and a 15-year recovery of your capital, on a railway that is going to last for a very long time, in a coalfield that certainly has a life of far more than 15 years, indicates that the CNR were a bit grasping.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has made some interesting points in his statement. First of all, he made the point that we should not be placed in a position of giving away our resources, and we find ourselves in total agreement with that view. If the coal is going to be sold below its market value, then that coal should remain in the ground and this project should not go ahead; we should not ask the people of Canada to put money in this particular development. So, price is all important. The market will decide whether or not this is a viable project.

Secondly, let it be said for the CNR that when they came to the table they came after being informed on only May 16 in Calgary that there was any desire by the provincial government in the Province of British Columbia to have them involved in any way. I understand that because of these time constraints they were only able to undertake a helicopter survey of the route to determine what the cost might be. Certainly, they did have more detailed engineering studies of the proposed Anzac route made available to them by BC Rail, but they expressed great concern about possible adverse rock formations, which could escalate substantially beyond estimates the cost of tunnel construction along the route—five tunnels in all. The honourable senator, with his knowledge of the west, knows how expensive tunnel work can be in the western provinces. Canadian National came to the bargaining table with a figure and said, in effect, "This is a construction figure that we have produced on the basis of our usual indices, standards and norms, an estimate based upon our best engineering assessment under the circumstances. This estimate does not include any allowance for additional assistance from any level of government but warns that there are cost overruns."

At one point the federal representatives suggested that our $70 million investment could be directed to reducing the cost of that CN or BC Rail rail construction process, thereby enabling the Province of British Columbia to quote a better railway rate to the coal companies. Perhaps if there had been an offer of matching provincial help to the CNR, a rate might have been developed "right in the ball park," as they say. BC Rail was chosen, however, by the Province of British Columbia. That decision is not disputed. Whether or not the Canadian National Railway asked for excessive profits is a question for them to answer for themselves. They came with certain figures, fully compatible, we were assured, with those which would have been developed by any other railway entity in the industry.

• (2110)

As I said, as the negotiations progressed, the British Columbia government expressed emphatically their desire to have BC Rail undertake infrastructure work.

Let me say, honourable senators, that with Senator Roblin's knowledge of the capacity of provincial governments to levy resource royalties, it may be possible, as coal prices and profits rise, for the Province of British Columbia to recapture many of BC Rail's costs.

Senator Roblin: I hesitate to prolong this discussion. My honourable friend draws so many red herrings across the trail that I really have to try to clarify the issue. In the first place, to deal with his last point, if royalties are charged, surely they are part of the price and will only stand up to whatever the commercial propositions are.

The second point I should like to make is that he now talks of a $70 million contribution toward this by the federal government. How is that to be recovered if this is to be a self-supporting operation?

The third point relates to the question of what the engineering problems were. The actual cost figure involved did not enter into my comments at all. I was talking about the application of rate of return and pay-back of capital. The point I was making is that the 20 per cent rate of return with a 15 per cent pay-back on a railway in a place where there is lots of coal—and will be for some considerable time—seems to me to be a sweetheart deal. I wish that in other business operations with which I have been associated in the past, somebody gave me that kind of proposition.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may be well advised to direct further inquiries regarding the specific rates quoted to the CNR itself. I shall certainly attempt to obtain further information on that point.

Mention was made of the proposal put by the Government of Canada, to contribute $70 million. It was suggested originally that this amount might be applied to the cost of rail construction. I should add that the federal government, during the course of negotiations, proposed to recapture this contribution without interest and far down the line, only after all construction costs of the railway had been paid.

Senator Roblin: How?

Senator Perrault: That proposition was put forward.

Senator Olson: They did not accept it, in any event.

Senator Doody: The honourable senator has talked out the Question Period.

Senator Donahoe: May I ask a supplementary question? Would the Honourable Leader of the Government tell us whether or not he thinks it advisable that an undertaking of these dimensions should be proceeded with, without the necessary preliminary environmental studies?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that has been done. Let me say that the agreement achieved with the Province of British Columbia in Ottawa last week included an agreement at the initiative of the federal government relative to native Indian peoples, manpower, and the status of women in relation to the project.

Senator Donahoe: Have these studies taken place since February 18 last?

Senator Perrault: Did the honourable senator raise the question whether the environmental studies had been undertaken since February of 1980?

Senator Donahoe: Yes.

Senator Perrault: I have no information regarding the dates involved in the environmental studies.

TRANSPORT

CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—ICEBREAKING FACILITIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers this evening. The first answer relates to a question raised by Senator Roblin on June 3. He wanted to know when the first federal icebreaker would arrive at Churchill, and what the plan was with respect to the motor vessel Arctic.

The date of arrival of the first government icebreaker at Churchill has not yet been determined, this being contingent on the timing of the first freight—grain shipment out of Churchill.

The motor vessel Arctic is operated on a commercial basis by the Canarctic Shipping Company Limited of Ottawa. Since February of this year, the company has made repeated attempts to secure a grain cargo for a mid-June loading out of Churchill.

Despite the fact that the company received every co-operation from those involved in the grain industry in Canada, it has become apparent in the last week or so that the international grain buyers are not prepared to consider an early Churchill cargo on a commercial basis. Having exhausted all possibilities of securing a Churchill cargo, the Canarctic Shipping Company had no choice but to commit the motor vessel Arctic to another trade.

CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—RAILWAYS INTERCHANGE AGREEMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There was a further question asked by Senator Roblin on June 3 regarding a report on progress that may or may not have been made in respect of an interchange agreement between Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railway on the Churchill grain subdivision to northern Manitoba.

I understand that a detailed answer was furnished to the honourable senator as a result of the same question being asked by him in the National Finance Committee. Because the answer is rather lengthy, I would ask your permission to have the answer taken as read so that it may be made part of the official record, if that is satisfactory.

Senator Roblin: Yes, please do.

(The answer follows:)

The question of the interchange of cars from CP points so as to allow them to move to Churchill was considered by the Snavely Commission which found that —the establishment of an open interchange between CP Rail and Canadian National for grain shipments destined to Churchill would have an insignificant impact on the costs and the efficiency of the rail transportation service;

—the economies that would result could probably be achieved through a concerted effort to originate Churchill grain on those CN lines which are proximate to Churchill; and —the principal justification for the establishment of an open interchange for Churchill shipments must lie with the flexibility that would accrue to the shipper—namely, the Canadian Wheat Board.

To date, the main emphasis has been placed upon attaining a railway interchange agreement that will allow cars from CP points to move to Prince Rupert. The emphasis has been placed upon Prince Rupert because:

—of the need to allow for the planning of a new grain terminal at Prince Rupert; and —the Churchill interchange is more complex by reason of the construction of railway interchange trackage that would be required.

The Prince Rupert Railway Interchange Agreement comes into effect on August 1, 1980. The Canadian Wheat Board and the Grain Transportation Authority have been asked to monitor the operation of the Agreement and to recommend any changes required. Following experience with the Prince Rupert Interchange Agreement, consideration will be given to an extension of the concept for the movement of CP cars to Churchill.

GRAIN

WHEAT SALES TO THE U.S.S.R. BY THE ARGENTINE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, on June 11 last, Senator Buckwold asked if I would comment on the report that the Argentine is stepping into the breach created in the supply of wheat to the U.S.S.R. and whether it has been cashing in by charging much higher prices than would normally be the case. I replied in part:

At any rate, I will take that question as notice and check on whether I am correct in suggesting that there was a gain of $50 a tonne—

The premium of $50 per tonne which Argentina received on sales to the U.S.S.R. is based on trade reports. We do not have access to documentation which would confirm this figure, but we consider the reports reliable. While the U.S.S.R. was apparently prepared to pay such a premium for a period after the U.S.A. announced its partial embargo, it is believed that the size of the premium has since declined sharply.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

BANNING OF GLASS CONTAINERS FOR CARBONATED DRINKS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers arising out of Item No. 3 on the order paper, a motion by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), that certain documents be laid before the house relating to the banning of certain glass containers for carbonated drinks. He also asked other related questions. I have the answers, but they include appendices. Perhaps I will simply inform you that Senator Fournier has a copy of both the answers and the appendices.

Senator Fournier asked why the news release, dated May 16, 1980, was produced and who advised the industry. The reason for the news release was to ensure that the Canadian public was aware of the minister's decision. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs met with officials of the Canadian Soft Drink Association on May 9. The meeting involved representatives of soft drink franchise houses and bottlers. The industry proposed certain courses of action during that discussion, and the basis of that understanding is found in the news release of May 16. Since that time officials have been working with the Canadian Soft Drink Association to finalize regulations, including associated test methods. Additionally, a socio-impact analysis of the regulations is being prepared by a consulting firm.

With regard to Senator Fournier's question concerning the task force mentioned in the press release, this was comprised of technical representatives selected by the industry—that is, representatives of franchise houses and bottlers—and representatives from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Senator Fournier questioned the matter of the coating of soft drink bottles. I can only state that this matter has been the subject of detailed study by senior officials of the industry, and I cannot identify any other group who would be more knowledgeable in that area.

Questions have also been raised regarding exploding bottles and mishandling. Since soft drink bottles are under a pressure of approximately 60 pounds per square inch, they are categorized as pressurized vessels. When the bottle breaks, whatever the cause, glass shards are released with explosive force which can cause injury. Many bottles break with explosive force when sitting undisturbed as the result of bruises received on one of the many trips they make in their use cycle. It is not possible to predict when such explosions may occur. Since the 1.5 litre bottles are large and heavy, they are more difficult to handle and are therefore more susceptible to damage in use. The plastic coating proposed by the industry will serve to provide for consumer protection from such explosions.

The drill test referred to in the news release of May 16 and referenced by Senator Fournier has been agreed to by the industry and simulates conditions found in spontaneous explosions associated with bruised glass.

With respect to who it was who initially asked the industry to co-operate by voluntary action in clearing the marketplace, I draw the senator's attention to a news release dated June 28, 1979. The minister of the day, the Honourable Allan Lawrence, in announcing his intention to take action under the Hazardous Products Act, appealed to retailers to halt the sale of all "torpedo-shaped" narrow neck 1.5 litre bottles and requested manufacturers to cease their distribution.

Senator Fournier asked for an explanation of the expression "modified soft drink bottle." A modified bottle means a bottle that has been coated with plastic.

With respect to Senator Fournier's question as to the meaning of "will not be permitted" in relation to additions to inventories of bottles of current design, the minister has an understanding, confirmed in writing with the industry, that bottles of the present design will not be newly introduced into the marketplace.

With respect to Senator Fournier's question as to why the ring proposed by Coca-Cola was not adopted, I can only draw his attention to a public statement made by the then minister, the Honourable Allan Lawrence, on the CBC program Marketplace of September 23, 1979, and I quote:

> In actual fact we did not get (the industry's) co-operation, and therefore we had to impose tests which were interim only. And then, as you know, one manufacturer came up with a device to circumvent that particular test . . . but which did absolutely nothing at all to reduce the injury susceptibility using the bottle.

The attachments to which I referred are comprised of the news release of May 16, 1980, and the news release issued by the previous minister, the Honourable Allan Lawrence.

I can also advise honourable senators that I did provide Senator Fournier with advance notice that I would be putting these answers on the record this evening, and he in turn indicated that he would like to have an opportunity to consider these answers and perhaps to discuss them with some of his informants within the industry following which we can deal with the item on the order paper standing now in the name of the Honourable Senator Flynn. We may be able to deal with that item either tomorrow or on Thursday.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ARTILLERY SYSTEMS—PARTICIPATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION (QUEBEC)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can now provide a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie earlier this evening respecting the alleged participation of Space Research Corporation (Quebec) at the International Conference on Artillery Systems.

[Senator Frith.]

The participation of individual scientists from Space Research Corporation (Quebec) in that conference has no relevance to the preliminary hearing in the Court of Sessions of the Peace in Montreal. This conference was organized by the American Defence Preparedness Association, although it received the help and support of Canadian government officials. The invitations to interested companies and individuals were issued by the American Defence Preparedness Association. The conference is a technical one intended to examine where NATO is going in the area of large calibre ammunition. It is in no way a trade fair.

The minister responsible for this matter in the other place stated as follows:

> I am sure that when these facts become known they will dispel any doubt as to the firmness of the Canadian government commitment to the UN embargo on the sales of military equipment to South Africa and our commitment to the cause of world disarmament.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Petten for the second reading of Bill C-21, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as Senator Petten pointed out in his very able presentation of the substance of Bill C-21, this is a measure that has been before us on three prior occasions. It was before us in the form of Bill S-4 in November, 1977, followed by Bill S-3 in October of 1978 and Bill S-5 in October of 1979. All of these bills were intituled: "An Act to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers." This is also the title of Bill C-21.

For various reasons, the predecessor Senate bills did not become law, and this year, for some reason or another, or for no particular reason, it was decided to initiate this legislation in the House of Commons, and it has been passed by that house and is now before us.

There are a few changes in Bill C-21 when compared to its predecessor bills, but none are major and none affect the substance of the bill. By way of example, in Bill C-21 we find a definition of "inspector" which did not appear in the predecessor bills. As well, the wording of subclause 3(2) has been changed, and paragraphs (e) and (f) have been added to subclause 3(1). Also, the bill is to come into effect on proclamation rather than on royal assent, as was the case in the predecessor bills. There has also been some rearrangement of the clauses of Bill C-21 as compared to the predecessor bills. I do not think any of these changes were necessary, but perhaps they are useful. In any event, they do no harm.

As mentioned by the sponsor, the International Convention for Safe Containers was adopted by the 1972 United Nations Conference on Container Traffic. The convention was developed in recognition of the need to maintain a high level of safety of human life in the handling, stocking and transporting of the large number of freight containers employed in international transport.

Bill C-21 provides for the Canadian government to implement the provisions of the International Convention for Safe Containers in Canada. The convention came into effect in 1977 following its ratification by the first 10 countries, and it is expected to be fully implemented on September 6, 1982. As honourable senators are aware, the convention sets minimum standards for safety approval and subsequent periodic examination of international cargo containers used in international transport.

These containers provide a more effective means of transporting freight. There are various kinds in use, ranging from the simple box with doors on one end to specialized containers with facilities for freezing or heating the freight so carried. They have made possible the transportation of cargo with a minimum of handling and, consequently, at a lower cost. Canada needs to ratify the convention for two reasons: first, adherence to the convention will provide a degree of safety required in the container industry and ensure uniform application of national laws concerning the safe usage of freight containers in international transport; secondly, the failure to do so would have the effect of disrupting the flow of Canadian containerized goods to and from the many countries which have ratified the convention.

Honourable senators, this bill should receive our approval. Since the previous Senate bill with the same title received favourable consideration in this chamber and since our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications examined two of these previous bills, and especially Bill S-5 in great detail, and since the House of Commons Transport Committee considered Bill C-76, I did not think it would be necessary to send this bill to any committee.

However, I understand that some observations have been made to the Chairman of our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, not regarding the substance of the bill but rather the form of it. It could therefore be that the chairman will wish to express an opinion on these matters.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, it is correct that since our last session I did receive some comments with reference to this bill. The comments were not concerned with the substance, as Honourable Senator Macdonald has correctly pointed out, but rather had to do with technical matters relating to the drafting of the bill.

Before expressing any opinion or giving any suggestions to honourable senators on whether this bill should be referred to committee in respect of these matters, I should like to have an opportunity to discuss the questions with the vice-chairman of the committee, the Honourable Senator Langlois. Accordingly, I ask leave of the Senate to adjourn this debate so that I may take advantage of Senator Langlois' knowledge of these matters before speaking further to them.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CONSTITUTION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider and report upon constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and upon the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

That the membership of the committee be increased to thirty members and that Rule 67(1)(j) be suspended in relation to membership of the committee;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the first paragraph of the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "upon" in the second line and substituting the following therefor:—

"the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights".—(Honourable Senator Asselin).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I think you have had enough speeches tonight from both sides of the chamber so I ask that this item be stood until tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Rousseau, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hays, P.C., for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to Honourable Senator Bosa.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I am grateful that the time limit on this debate has been extended, thus enabling many more senators to register their views. But for this extension, I would not now have the opportunity to speak, so I should like to express my appreciation to both the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition for this imaginative change.

I should like to congratulate Senator Rousseau, the mover, and Senator Hays, the seconder, of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a great honour and privilege to be asked to initiate this important debate, and both honourable senators lived up to the high standards of eloquence and substance that have characterized the speeches of those who have initiated the Throne Speech debate in previous sessions.

I should like to express my congratulations to Senator Marchand on his appointment as Speaker of the Senate. He has had a colourful political career at various levels of government; he has served with distinction as a cabinet minister in several portfolios; and he having accepted this new and onerous challenge as Speaker of the Senate, we will wish him well in his new responsibilities.

I should like also to express my congratulations to his predecessor as Speaker, Senator Allister Grosart. Senator Grosart served in that capacity for too short a time; but, despite that, during the short-lived Thirty-first Parliament he displayed a remarkable knowledge of the rules and total dedication to the responsibilities that go with the speakership. He won the admiration and respect of his colleagues, and he pleasantly surprised many of us in his endeavour to become bilingual. Now that he has vacated the Chair, it can be stated that the Senate floor has regained a formidable and valuable debater.

Honourable senators, as we enter the decade of the 80's we are confronted with serious political and economic challenges. I doubt that there has ever been a period in Canadian history when Canadians have discussed national unity and the economy with greater passion and intensity than in the recent past. The referendum in Quebec and the dramatic energy crisis have served to shake up many Canadians who had taken both national unity and economic stability for granted. English Canadians and French Canadians have much to be proud about. Canada has never had a major war or a major revolution fought on its soil and, with the exception of a skirmish in 1837, the French and English have lived side by side for over 200 years without firing a shot at one another. There is no such parallel, to my knowledge, in European history. That does not mean that there has always been harmony between them. There have been periods of strain and differences like the conscription issue.

[Senator Asselin.]

But Canadians overcame their historic, geographic and climatic difficulties to build a nation out of their differences. They have a long tradition of finding the middle way. Canadians have been tempered by these events. They have shown that they can understand each other's point of view, that they know how to compromise. They have shown that they deal with crises in a rational, civilized and mature manner.

The Speech from the Throne sets out the intentions of the government, regarding action to be taken to deal with the issues confronting us at this time, in the following words:

> You will be asked to consider a program of action designed:
> —to respond to individual needs by promoting greater security for the elderly, expanded opportunities for the young, and equality for women;
> —to achieve security of energy supply at a fair price for all Canadians;
> —to promote a national development policy that will provide jobs, stimulate growth, build upon regional strengths, and increase Canadian ownership and control of our economy;
> —to strengthen national institutions, while at the same time making them more responsive to provincial and regional goals;
> —to ensure that Canada plays a vigorous part in the world beyond our borders.

Some degree of security for the elderly who qualify for the Guaranteed Income Supplement has already been achieved by the recent enactment of the $35-a-month increase for GIS recipients.

In the area of national unity the Prime Minister has already been meeting with the leaders of the opposition parties and with the premiers of the provinces to set the mechanism in motion for constitutional reform, which it is hoped will lead to important amendments to reflect some of the aspirations of the provinces, while at the same time ensuring that the federal government retains enough powers to guarantee the same services and opportunities for all Canadians. Canadians will be witnessing a new stage in the evolution of our nationhood. I believe that our leaders have the will and the wisdom to give and take, to ensure that Canada will continue to be a strong, united and vibrant country.

There is, however, one area of national importance on which the Speech from the Throne was disappointingly silent. No emphasis was placed on the cultural aspect of this country, yet the cultural dimensions of our people make up the very fibre of Canadian society.

It is a fact that Canada has a multicultural society. Multiculturalism is not an objective that we in Canada, as a government or a people, are merely seeking to realize, for we are one of the few truly multicultural societies in the world today. Other countries do have populations culturally as diverse as ours, but few other countries accept the fact of diversity as a benefit to be treasured and celebrated.

Moreover, in the past generation our diversity became even greater than perhaps most people realize. To me, that is a good thing, because I believe, as did Lord Acton in his essay on "the nationality question" in 1861, "that unity through diversity is a political principle superior to other forms of political organization which are based on membership in one group".

Perhaps the best possible example of this can be found in Toronto, not because I am from Toronto, but because of the dramatic demographic changes that have occurred in that city during the past 20 to 25 years. Those changes have transformed Toronto into one of the world's great cosmopolitan centres. That cosmopolitanism has made it a richer and more tolerant city than it was in the past. That is not to say that no problems exist, but I believe that because of the change that has occurred, questions are debated today that 25 years ago would not have seen the light of day; and, because they are being debated and resolved, we are that much better for it.

In my judgment, the diversity of our population encourages such an open discussion. For those who fear Canada's diversity, our cultural mosaic, I can only say that since the multicultural policy was introduced we have not had any incidents of xenophobia to match those that occurred in the country when Canada had a more homogeneous population. There is no doubt in my mind that if, in the 1890s and the early part of this century, we had the pluralistic population that we have today, there would never have been a Manitoba schools question. That was a reprehensible denial of basic rights.

Again to paraphrase Lord Acton, the security and freedom of a state can best be assured when based on two or more peoples. If that principle had operated in a situation such as that in Manitoba, perhaps we would not be experiencing some of the problems of unity we have today.

The health of a democracy can best be tested by studying the way it treats its minorities. A society which, either through deliberate action or through benign ignorance, subjects its minorities to a second-class status is not a truly healthy democracy. In this respect we have much to be sorry for today. For example, had we been more tolerant of the needs and aspirations of francophone minorities outside Quebec, and had we treated them with similar support to that which the anglophone minority received in Quebec, there might not have been a referendum in Quebec last May.

It is for this reason that the members of this chamber, a group of Canadians who understand the value of diversity, should be in the vanguard of those seeking to redress the wrongs of the past. It is we who should be arguing for the entrenchment of language rights in a new Constitution. For if we, as a country, cannot make provisions to support the francophone community of Canada and, as a result, lose them, our largest minority, from our society, then who will support the remaining minorities? How healthy will our democracy be if unity is founded on the principle of uniformity rather than diversity? Will we tolerate a Chinese Canadian, if we cannot accommodate a French Canadian? Who will support the right of other minority groups to the retention of their culture if we do not support the rights of French Canadians?

In providing the support that we must to Canada's francophone community, we can destroy once and forever the myth that diversity, that Canada's multiculturalism policy, is a divisive force. Lending our support to a community which is now at the crossroads of its destiny will not only strengthen national unity, but will also encourage a mosaic of communities that will enhance our individual development, while at the same time building strong links between communities. This is integration. I believe it was because of this very principle that Prime Minister Trudeau moved to have a multicultural policy in 1971. He understood that more was to be gained by working together than by trying to achieve our goals individually.

An example of working together occurred recently, if honourable senators will allow me to digress for a moment. The Canadian Chinese community achieved a major victory when their demands for justice were heard. The CTV network made an unreserved apology for an injustice they perpetrated when they broadcasted the blatantly biased program "Campus Giveaway". It was critically important that the Canadian-Chinese community be vindicated, but what was of equal importance was the support that community received from other Canadians. People of all backgrounds stood up to be counted along with them. They did not say "It's not our problem." Instead, they said, "These problems are our problems," and that, to me, honourable senators, is what multiculturalism is all about. It is, to use a common expression, "one for all, and all for one." Canadians of Chinese origin must now feel much more a part of Canadian society as a result of the support their community received from other Canadians at a crucial time.

When serious incidents occur in cities such as Vancouver and Toronto, involving South-East Asians, blacks, or Ukrainian-Canadians, it is not that they alone have a problem; we all have a problem, and if we do not understand that fundamental factor, we shall all have serious difficulties in the future. All of the various groups in Canada must be encouraged to work together in promoting their own needs, aspirations and goals.

It is from this basic belief that there flows a further concern of mine. I believe that more can be achieved if the federal cabinet and the Public Service of Canada will work together toward a goal of equal opportunities for all Canadians. The structures of the Government of Canada perhaps best exemplify what can be achieved through unity of purpose rather than by random, individual actions. In a word, solitary action limits possibilities, while collective action is the means for all of us to achieve our goals. It is through the collective action of organizations that the necessary resources can be made available to ensure one's own culture as well as the survival of others.

I wish to make a plea based on some of my earlier comments. If we wish Canada to remain a unified country, we must recognize the place which our two official languages have in our society. This principle is not negotiable; it is rooted in Confederation. The two official languages are a fundamental building block of our cultural mosaic. They provide the basic ingredient for unity in diversity, and it is from here that the concept evolves into cultural pluralism. Some people have confused cultural pluralism with multilingualism. Some people sincerely believe that multiculturalism is a divisive policy that sets Canadians apart, that "ghettoizes them". These are erroneous interpretations. We must ensure that the policy is properly explained if multiculturalism is to receive wide-base support in our society.

The policy on multiculturalism, basically stated, gives the opportunity to all Canadians, regardless of ethnic background, to feel that the federal government has acknowledged their presence in this country; that they are accepted for what they are and not for what others would like them to be. It is this acknowledgement that makes them feel that they have psychological equality as an integral element of this society. It is this feeling that instills in the minorities a sense of belonging, a feeling of being part of this country.

When they think of minority groups many Canadians immediately associate them with recent arrivals; whereas, in fact, members of minority groups have participated in virtually every phase of Canada's development from the first settlers to today. Our history books do not give enough emphasis to this very important reality of our past. Canadians would have a greater regard for one another if they had a greater sense of awareness about each other's contribution.

To dramatize this situation, the Canadian government should consider erecting a national heritage building of great dimensions. Perhaps an appropriate name could be the "Hall of the Pioneers" or "Hall of Canada". The contributions of all Canadians should be shown. Great care should be taken not to overlook the contributions of Canada's native peoples and those of the ethnic minorities. The Hall of the Pioneers should be built in Ottawa, and all Canadians, including those of all ethnic minorities, should be given the opportunity to have some input in building such an edifice so that it will reflect the art, building materials and design characteristics of the lands and cultures of origin of the people of Canada. It should be the place to visit, for young and old. It would instill pride in all of us, but more particularly in young Canadians, who will thus be better equipped to understand the complexities of our society. To strengthen further our sense of awareness of our past, the buildings known as the East Block, the West Block and the South Block should be named after former Prime Ministers and others who have contributed so much to the building of this country. Reviewing our history, recording it fairly and accurately and popularizing it can play a vital part in strengthening national unity.

We have a unique opportunity in Canada to show that it is not necessary to be all the same in order to have a harmonious society; to show that our cultural differences do not prevent our forging ahead and building and prospering. Unlike many areas of the world where racial or religious conflicts have caused untold misery, Canada stands out as a model in the international community. This is what multiculturalism is all about. This is why Canada is such a great country. The Hall of the Pioneers should be a place of meditation, a sort of national shrine. It should be the place that Canadians should visit when they lose sight of what Canada is all about. Canada is a young nation, and Canadians need to strengthen their identity in the light of present-day realities. We still do not have an official national anthem! We have the will. We have the disposition. Let us give matters of patriotism greater priority. This is the time for us to debate these matters, and out of this debate I hope that we can formulate specific recommendations for the government to consider.

Motion agreed to, and the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

On motion of the Honourable Royce Frith, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ENERGY

INCREASE IN OPEC PRICE OF OIL—IMPACT ON OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION PROGRAM

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last week the OPEC nations raised their minimum price for imported oil to $32 U.S. per barrel. Venezuela will increase its price on July 1. Should Saudi Arabia follow suit later in the year, the average price which Canada pays for imported oil will reach approximately $39.20 Canadian per barrel.

In the light of these OPEC increases, will the minister assure us that it is not the intention of the government to eliminate the Oil Import Compensation Program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is not yet clear what the full impact of the most recent OPEC price increases will be for Canada, since differing prices have been announced by several members of the OPEC cartel. I am pleased, however—and it is worth noting—that Canada's major supplier, Saudi Arabia, has not increased its price as yet, although they have stated an inclination to do so. Since Saudi Arabia supplies at the present time about half our offshore requirements we are not faced with an across-the-board increase of the nature my friend has referred to.

With regard to the other part of his question, dealing with whether or not we intend to abandon the oil Import Compensation Program, I may say that we certainly do not intend to do so. It is really too early, however, to suggest what impact these various increases will have on supplies coming into Canada.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, consumers of electricity in Atlantic Canada already pay the highest prices of any province in this country, because so much of that electricity is generated by means of offshore oil. Would the minister offer us the assurance now that the government intends to give some additional subsidy to electrical generation from oil in Atlantic Canada, or, at the very least, that the current differential in prices paid for electricity in Canada will not be allowed to widen as a result of higher costs of offshore oil.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, of course I cannot give any assurance that there is going to be any change, or what the honourable senator has referred to as additional subsidies for electricity generation, or, indeed, for any other purpose. What I can tell him, or remind him of, is that the oil compensation program applies to the oil that is used in those electrical generation plants as well as to any other use of crude oil in Canada, and there is no intention of withdrawing from that.

Senator Flynn: For the time being.

Senator Sherwood: A final supplementary, honourable senators. The OPEC nations considered, but did not decide upon, a proposal to cut production by approximately five per cent. In the light of this prospect, and in the light of the possibility of the diminishing of conventional supplies from western Canada, would the minister tell us what precise plans exist within the government for assuring the security of energy supplies to Atlantic Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the answer to that is far too complex to deal with in any comprehensive way during the Question Period, because a number of programs are being considered, some of which have already been stated as government policies. I am referring to such things as maximum substitution of natural gas for oil, and a whole lot of other methods of meeting the problem that has been outlined. Quite obviously, however, you cannot deal with such matters in a question and answer period. In any case, there may be important factors in the situation that have not yet reached a sufficiently advanced stage of development for us to make an announcement on them.

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday, in posing a question to the minister, I was sent away with an indication that he would do my homework for me. However, my conscience gave me some difficulty, so when I awakened this morning I decided to do my own homework and I obtained a transcript of a statement by the Honourable Marc Lalonde. I refer specifically to his answer to a question put to him on page 1 of the transcript with reference to the agreement to be put in place before the end of this month.

● (1410)

The answer by Mr. Lalonde is as follows:

> I'd like to be able to answer that one positively, unfortunately I can't do it now. I have had some telephone conversations this week with Mr. Leitch. I did put forward another offer which would have had an interim agreement until October 1st of this year and which would have put into effect identical conditions to those contained in the Conservative budget of December 11th—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I also did some homework. I have obtained a copy of the transcript. Senator Nurgitz is focussing on the same portion he focussed on yesterday. At page 2, my transcript shows that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did not indicate that the entire package of measures under discussion with Alberta was identical to that offered by the previous administration. He responded to a specific question as to whether the proposed $2 interim increase, which was rejected by the Province of Alberta, was identical to that offered by the Conservative administration. The exact question and answer are as follows:

> —why did Alberta . . . decline to accept your proposal to accept a two dollar ($2.00) increase, effective July 1st to October, which is, if I recall, precisely the terms of the agreement they would have had under the Conservative proposal?

The reply was:

> Well it is indeed precisely what was under the Conservative proposal.

Therefore, I would suggest to the honourable senator that while he is not wrong in what he has put forth, it is not the whole of what was in the Conservative proposal because that included some revenue-sharing. We have to look at precisely what was asked and what reply was made, and that concerned an interim period of three months in which there could be a $2 increase, which is identical. Of course, the other components of the package were not contained in that. Hopefully that would have given them three months longer to negotiate the much larger package deal.

Senator Nurgitz: Could the minister tell us if the government has obtained an assurance from Alsands Corporation that construction of that plant will proceed this year should an interim agreement of three months be reached with the provinces?

Senator Olson: I cannot answer that question. The honourable senator knows that the Honourable Merv Leitch, representing Alberta, and his officials, are meeting today with the Honourable Marc Lalonde and his officials. I am not at liberty to give the details of that negotiation, even if I know them. However, I believe that some assurances are on the table—at least, I would be surprised if they were not—respecting the speed at which additional supplies can be brought on, including the Alsands project.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: My question is for the Leader of the Goverment in the Senate. A release by the Department of National Health and Welfare indicated there will be indexing in July of old age security pensions. It was also indicated that the $35 increase in the GIS would be included. However, there is a serious omission when it comes to veterans who receive the War Veterans Allowance and who are 65 years of age or older. The Minister of Veterans Affairs indicated in the other place that veterans would also receive the $35 per household. Would the leader confirm this? This is an updated question to one I asked about ten days ago. Is the goverment going to introduce legislation or make an order in council to ensure that veterans who are over 65 will receive that $35?

● (1415)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I do not have that information at my desk.

TRANSPORT

DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHEASTERN BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL FIELDS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government and I had a brief exchange last night concerning the development of the northeast British Columbia coal fields. As I understand his reply, he is going to report to us in due course as to whether there is a commitment of funds from the federal treasury to the National Harbours Board in respect of that agency's work on the Prince Rupert terminal.

Today I would ask him in respect of the $70 million offer made by the federal government for the construction of the spur line, which was turned down by the Province of British Columbia, whether he can tell us now, or provide in writing, the terms and conditions that the federal government sought to impose in relation to that offer?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the offer by the federal government to provide this amount of $70 million to be applied to the construction of the so-called rail infrastructure was based upon the concept that when the price of coal rose to a certain level, that would trigger a repayment process. No interest was to be charged on that amount of money. It was suggested that active negotiations be initiated between the federal and provincial officials to work out the details of how that would be achieved.

At one point in the negotiations the federal government offered to recapture that amount only after other costs associated with the rail infrastructure had been paid. This was a gesture on the part of the federal government to assist in getting the development ahead.

I think it is accurate to say—and Senator Olson was deeply involved in the negotiations—that the proposal never advanced beyond the idea stage. The details were never finally resolved because of the decision of the Province of British Columbia to have their own entity, BC Rail, undertake the infrastructure project.

In summary, it can be said that this matter was discussed at some length during the process of negotiations, but after an adjournment requested by the provincial government they came back to the negotiating table with the alternate proposal that BC Rail undertake the project. They also said they would like the $70 million federal government offer to be applied to the non-rail infrastructure of the project.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Reporting to the Senate on May 13, the day after his visit to Washington, the minister expressed confidence that there now existed in Washington a determination to overcome all obstacles that were preventing construction of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline. Would the minister bring us up to date on the progress of those negotiations and give us his best estimate as to if and when those problems might be resolved?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can report—I don't know quite how to say this—some progress, considerable progress, a great deal of progress; I think any one of them would be fairly accurate—has been made. However, there are still some outstanding issues, I suppose, some more or less important, depending on your interpretation. We have not yet reached the stage at which we can finally announce that all the requirements have been met. As for trying to predict when it will happen, I guess I have been in politics long enough to know that one really should not predict when somebody else is going to make up his mind.

Senator Balfour: According to a report in today's Globe and Mail, under the byline of Jeff Carruthers, the United States has failed to resolve several issues, and the attitude of the Canadian government is hardening. Is the minister familiar with the report I refer to, and if so is he prepared to characterize it as accurate or inaccurate?

Senator Olson: One of the rules in Beauchesne, the fifth edition, is that you do not comment on the accuracy of press reports, and I do not want to break that long-standing rule in this chamber. Some people will read this and put their own interpretation on what is important, what is hardening, what is softening, and so on. It is subject to those interpretations. The fact still remains, however, that Canada and the United States entered into an agreement, part of which calls for the two governments to exchange letters or some other declaration that the section to be built in their country can be financed. That is part of the arrangement.

There is a perfectly logical reason for that. There is no point in one country going ahead with the construction if they are going to build a pipeline to the border and the other people are unable to give assurance that their section will be built, either to receive gas from them or take the gas away from the pipeline that is here. Canada is in both those positions. It is at the Alaska border to receive the gas. There is not much point in building a pipeline there unless the American section from Prudhoe Bay down to the border is in place to deliver the gas to that gate. The same thing is true where it enters the lower 48 states at the 49th parallel. We must have some assurance that that line will be in there to take the gas out the other end. I guess the United States requires from us the same assurance; if they are going ahead building this pipeline they need to know that the link in Canada is also going to go ahead.

It is a fact that is where we now stand, and we need some assurances that it is financeable, that in the opinion of the United States government it can be financed. That has not been fully satisfied to date.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCREASED GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—ACTION BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I hope.

Senator Buckwold: For the time being, yes.

Senator Flynn: On the other side they wouldn't hear you.

Senator Buckwold: As long as you hear me, Senator Flynn, that is the only important ear I am looking for.

Senator Bird introduced Bill C-16, which received our unanimous approval, which increased the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month. At that time I asked whether this amount of money was being passed on in total by the provinces. I was advised that assurances that the money was being passed on were received from Nova Scotia and British Columbia. Senator Bird then was good enough to table some correspondence from the minister, in which correspondence the minister had asked the provinces to make sure that these needed and necessary funds were passed on.

My question to the leader is: Have the other provinces given assurances that these funds will be passed on? I have read with interest that it is hoped that these payments will go forward soon. However, I have to tell the Leader of the Government—and I am sure I speak for all senators—that we will be watching with interest to see that they are passed on. I personally intend to keep asking the leader about this, so I hope he will bring good news soon indicating that these funds are being paid to those aged and needy people.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Buckwold for his comments. Certainly, there is a resolve on the part of members of all political parties, in both Houses of Parliament, that the full benefits of this measure find their way to the needy recipients. While I do not have a further update with respect to provinces, other than the ones cited by Senator Buckwold, an immediate inquiry will go forward, the answer to which hopefully will be that these benefits are being passed along. I shall report back to the Senate on this matter as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: So you have nothing new to add.

Hon. Jack Marshall: May I ask a supplementary question? When the leader is obtaining that information for us, would he also remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that a certain category of Canadian citizens—the widows who never qualified for the spouse's allowance—are still receiving only welfare. In that respect they are being discriminated against because they are not married. Would the leader impress upon the minister the vital need to increase the amount that these widows are now getting so that they are at least brought up to the current standard of living.

Senator Perrault: The Minister of National Health and Welfare is a very compassionate and understanding person. She really needs no reminder of the need which exists for those people.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ARTILLERY SYSTEMS—PARTICIPATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION (QUEBEC)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, last evening I asked the Leader of the Government a question regarding the Space Research Corporation, which with its founder, Mr. Bull, was found guilty by an American court. At that time the leader was good enough to send for an answer, which he gave before the house rose. Can he now say whether the government has any feelings of misgiving, or any sense that something inappropriate is taking place, in that the Government of Canada is supporting the holding of a conference in the Ottawa Conference Centre—which is a very official place—where the principal adviser is a man who, with his company, has been found guilty of supplying arms to South Africa which, on excellent evidence it has been found, have already been used for not very good purposes?

Further, is there any sense that such an activity as this upcoming conference is inconsistent with the proclamations in favour of disarmament which found themselves so nobly expressed in the Throne Speech debate which we concluded just last evening?

● (1430)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no further information to bring to Senator Macquarrie and others on this particular matter this afternoon. However, the comments of the honourable senator will be brought to the attention of the appropriate ministers in the other place and an answer will be forthcoming.

Senator Flynn: Not in the other place; in the government.

Senator Perrault: They serve from the other place.

Senator Asselin: They serve here, too.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for Economic Development. When will the minister be in a position to bring us an update or status report on the present financial status of the country?

We have not had a budget presented since last December, and that budget appeared to be greeted with something less than enthusiasm by those sitting opposite.

Senator Bosa: And the people of Canada.

Senator Doody: And the people of Canada, yes—something which they have since come to regret. We will have a rather substantial borrowing bill before us shortly, and in the light of that I am wondering whether the minister can bring us up to date on the present cost of the oil subsidy in eastern Canada and other financial matters. There have been increases in the price of OPEC oil since December of last year, and certainly inflation continues to be substantial. As well, the expenses of government have not decreased in any amount, or at least I assume they have not decreased. All of these are assumptions, because we do not have any hard information.

Can we look forward to having another financial report or a mini-budget, or something in the near future?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall carry that request to the Minister of Finance. It is not normal to have more than one budget a year, but obviously we are in a somewhat unusual position this year having been newly elected to office. I cannot give any specific date, but I presume we shall bring down a budget within a year of our election to office.

The senator's suggestion is an interesting one. The Minister of Finance did respond to similar requests in the other place by bringing in a Statement on the Economy, which was immediately termed a mini-budget by the opposition, and they then demanded a full budget debate.

If my honourable friend would give me some kind of assurance that his colleagues in the other place would not want all of that time set aside rather than dealing with the important legislation that is before the house, that would be helpful. But even if we cannot go so far as having another official State of the Ecomomy Statement such as the minister made last month, I would be pleased to try to obtain some replies at least to the specific questions posed by the honourable senator today.

Senator Doody: So that I am clear on this, is the minister asking for an assurance that Parliament will not ask to debate the financial situation of the country once the government gets around to presenting the facts?

Senator Olson: No, I did not say that at all. I just hope that if the senator wants an update on the economy every month in the form that he has asked for it, his colleagues—and I am sure my honourable friend has a great deal of influence on his colleagues—will not then immediately demand several days to reply, as they did in the case of the so-called mini-budget, which it was not at all. What it was, honourable senators, was a statement on the economy given in response to persistent requests from members of the opposition in the other place.

Senator Roblin: But they were not allowed to talk about it.

Senator Olson: They could have used those days set aside for the opposition to talk about it.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his answer. In the event that the Minister of Finance decides to bring in another non-budget, which might turn out to be a financial statement or an economic report, I shall ask my colleagues in the other place not to embarrass the government by asking questions.

Senator Olson: That is going too far.

Senator Buckwold: Why don't you follow that advice here?

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question respecting the government policy on aid to convention centres. My query is addressed to the Leader of the Government. He may recall that we talked about this on May 14 last, at which time he told me that no policy was available as yet. At about that same time his colleague in the other place, the Honourable Charles Lapointe, wrote to the Mayor of the City of Winnipeg to the effect, according to the mayor's understanding, that the policy of the government was to provide for the funding of the centre in Vancouver because of a previous commitment, and that was all. So I daresay the citizens of Winnipeg were a little upset to read in the papers the other day that there is a policy that goes beyond Vancouver and includes Montreal and Toronto, and also the Honourable Herb Gray stated that Hamilton, Halifax, Edmonton and Victoria are on the list for future consideration. I merely modestly request that the City of Winnipeg be added to that list as well because I feel they are entitled to that consideration. After all, they were the pioneers of this kind of thing and it would be a sad fact if it did not pay to go ahead.

• (1435)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since this matter was the subject of discussion in the Senate there have been some developments in respect of convention centres and federal involvement in those centres. I would be pleased to bring a statement to the Senate on that subject as soon as it is possible.

I have received a communication from the great City of Winnipeg outlining in some detail the belief that there should be a degree of retroactive, ex poste facto, federal funding for their splendid convention facilities. As I say, a report will be brought to the Senate on the subject.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his abundant use of superlatives.

Senator Flynn: Nothing new there.

Senator Roblin: No, nothing new there. If it were considered parliamentary, I would call him "Senator Puff." I do not think that is parliamentary, so perhaps I will not use that expression. I will say to my honourable friend, however, that it was found possible to make a statement of policy in the City of Montreal and a statement of policy in the City of Toronto the other day. Why is it not possible to make a statement of policy here?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, inquiries will go forward and I will have a discussion with Manitoba's great minister, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, regarding the matter.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: He is the minister who is doing such a superb job for his province, for western Canada—indeed, for all of Canada.

Senator Asselin: "Superb" and "great".

Senator Roblin: I can't top that!

Senator Asselin: Those are the only words he knows.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, on May 7, in the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I asked that a question be directed to him dealing with the funding of civil service pensions and the indexing of the funding system. I indicated that I had various other concerns about pensions policies generally, for both the public service and private. Nothing has come forward on that matter. Will the leader therefore try to obtain that information for us? It is a matter of considerable concern to many people in this country, and I think it will come to be demonstrated in the not too distant future that there is good reason for that concern.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may have some information on that particular subject in my book, which contains a good deal of information regarding such matters. If I am able to locate the information this afternoon I will ask for leave to provide it.

THE SENATE

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF SENATE SEATING PLAN

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a non-partisan question for the Leader of the Government. Visitors to the Senate gallery have been asking for the seating plan that is usually available to tourists at this time. Can the leader inform the members of the Senate when the final seating arrangements will be available?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Bosa for that non-partisan question, which is really in the interests of all members of the Senate. I understand that the printers are now producing such a plan, which will serve as an invaluable guide to the visitors who grace this chamber.

Senator Roblin: I trust it is a "perfect" seating plan.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to the question asked by the Honourable Senator Doody during the Question Period on May 7 concerning the financing of public service pensions.

As the honourable senator has indicated, public service pensions are indexed to reflect rises in the cost of living. The Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account—the special account to which contributions are made and from which indexation benefits are paid—is not maintained on a fully funded basis as is the main pension account, the Public Service Superannuation Account. Rather, the financing method which has been used to date to provide for indexation is what is commonly termed "pay-as-you-go" and, as the name implies, this financing method entails the paying of indexation benefits out of current income as they fall due.

My colleague the President of the Treasury Board, who is the minister responsible for the Public Service Superannuation Act, has been studying a number of major pension issues of which the continued viability of the current pay-as-you-go financing system is one, and I trust that in due course I will be able to advise of any changes proposed by the government.

I should think that is probably an answer to part of what Senator Doody asked earlier, but I wanted to put it in the context of the reply.

[Senator Doody.]

HOUSING

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—MORTGAGE FUNDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have a reply to another question posed by Senator Doody some time ago respecting the housing industry. He wanted to know whether the minister could indicate whether the government was considering eliminating the 12 per cent federal sales tax on building materials, and, if not, what other measures were being considered to aid the housing industry.

When we come to the so-called "other measures," the list is so long and comprehensive that I would suggest that the answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

On the specific question of the "12 per cent federal tax on building materials," the federal sales tax rate was effectively reduced from 12 per cent to 9 per cent by Mr. Chrétien in his November 18, 1976, budget for all goods other than alcohol and tobacco products. Further, construction materials and equipment for buildings are generally taxable at a reduced 5 per cent rate, this measure having been introduced by Mr. Turner in his budget of November 18, 1974. Certain construction materials which contribute to the conservation of energy are fully exempt from tax while structural building materials (such as fabricated structural steel and concrete products) are taxed only on the cost of materials.

The costs of these measures in terms of foregone government revenues was estimated as well in excess of $500 million in 1979 alone. Any further concessions in that connection would of course be of a budgetary nature and would be announced in the context of a budget.

With respect to the broader question of the policy alternatives, the government has received numerous representations from the construction industry for measures of relief against what were at one point historically high interest rates. Proposals have ranged from mortgage interest subsidies to reinstatement of the special capital cost allowance provisions of the Income Tax Act. These have to be seen in the broader context of requests for assistance from a number of sectors of the Canadian economy which, rightly or wrongly, saw themselves as being unduly affected by high interest rates. As stated by the Minister of Finance in his April 21, 1980, speech in the house, the government firmly believes that the only viable solution in the long term lies in the pursuit of fiscal and monetary policies aimed at a lasting reduction in overall interest rates.

Within the constraints imposed by that broad objective, the government is reviewing the representations it has received and assessing a number of options. Any specific proposal coming out of this exercise would be submitted to Parliament in due course. It would have to be seen in the context of the considerable government resources that are presently devoted to the housing sector, and which were estimated at some $7 billion in 1979, in tax expenditures alone. It would also have to be seen in the context of the substantial declines in interest rates which have occurred recently and which are seen as a very encouraging development.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, not that I am so proud of the content of the question that my honourable friend has just been answering, but I should like to draw to his attention that, although in responding to questions he frequently says he cannot speak for other ministers, he ought not to reply to other senators. The question was mine, and not Senator Doody's.

Senator Olson: I am sorry.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Petten for the second reading of Bill C-21, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators will no doubt remember that in the course of this debate last night, as he was concluding his remarks, the Honourable Senator Macdonald said that because the contents of the bill were in substance pretty much what had been before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications he was not of the feeling that it should be referred to that committee again. He added that he understood that I had received some comments of a technical nature concerning the bill which might lead to its being sent to committee.

Following Senator Macdonald's remarks I confirmed that I had received some comments of such a nature and I asked leave to adjourn the debate until I could consult with certain members of my committee.

As a result of those consultations I have come to the conclusion that the bill need not go to the committee in respect of comments which were the subject of the remarks by Senator Macdonald and myself last evening. So far as I am concerned, then, as chairman of that committee, I do not consider it necessary that the matter be further considered or considered again by that committee. I suppose, therefore, that the debate could be concluded. I am not quite sure what I should do by way of concluding it, except perhaps simply to sit down.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Hon. William J. Petten moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services.

He said: Honourable senators, in drawing your attention to this bill, I should like, first, to explain my understanding of the purpose of the bill, or the evil that it is aimed at; secondly, to give a brief outline of the historical setting for the bill; and, thirdly, to review briefly the provisions of the bill.

The object of the bill, or the evil that it is aimed at, is a particularly unattractive—if I might make an understatement—form of international terrorism, namely, aerial hijacking.

There is no absence of formal agreements or declarations by nations regarding aerial hijacking. In fact, the obligation to extradite or prosecute hijackers has a firm basis in international law. For example, it is an essential operating provision of the 1970 Hague Convention for the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft, to which Canada and 100 other states are parties.

The difficulty is not the absence of international agreements defining the offences and setting out appropriate penalties. It is the reluctance of governments to face up to their obligations when it comes to taking appropriate legal action against the offenders.

Indeed, as many of us know, some nations, for various reasons, seem to condone, if not openly support, the activities of such hijackers, and it is that kind of culpability or attitude on the part of governments that, in turn, led to what is now a reasonably well-known declaration by seven nations at Bonn dealing more particularly with this subject. In that connection, there have been international speeches and discussions on the subject. One hundred nations then became parties to the Hague Convention, and at Bonn in 1978 the seven nations—France, Italy, Germany, Canada, the United States, Great Britain and Japan—joined in a declaration.

The 1978 Bonn Declaration is not lengthy, and reads as follows:

> The Heads of State and Government, concerned about terrorism and the taking of hostages, declare that their Governments will intensify their joint efforts to combat international terrorism. To this end, in cases where a country refuses extradition or prosecution of those who have hijacked an aircraft and/or do not return aircraft, the Heads of State and Government are jointly resolved that their Governments shall take immediate action to cease all flights to that country. At the same time, their Governments will initiate action to halt all incoming flights from that country or from any country by the airline of the country concerned.
> They urge other Governments to join them in this commitment.

Since the Bonn Declaration in 1978 there have been, I believe, 17 major hijacking incidents. It seems that the seven nations and their officials have reached the conclusion that further specific action is necessary to implement, first, the Hague Convention, and, secondly and more particularly, the Bonn Declaration.

In view of the quite succinct and limpid words of the declaration, if honourable senators will look at Bill S-7, which is the top bill of those stacked under their desks, they will see that the operative clause is clause 3. It reads:

> Where the Secretary of State for External Affairs certifies to the Governor in Council that a state is in default within the meaning of subsection (2), the Governor in Council may, by order, prohibit—

Let us now turn to the proposed subsection (2) referred to, which logically is the next thing we should look at, because there we find what constitutes a default. It says:

> For the purposes of subsection (1), a state is in default if the state has not extradited or prosecuted any of the parties to an unlawful act—

So the first part deals with the prosecution and extradition of hijackers, and the second part says:

> or returned an aircraft in respect of which an unlawful act has been committed to the persons lawfully entitled to possession thereof.

So there is the default. Returning now to subclause (1), it says that if there is a default, then:

> —the Governor in Council may, by order, prohibit air carriers from carrying out any one or more of the following activities, having regard to the circumstances:

Then "the following activities" are set out. They are six in number and are as follows:

> (a) operating a commercial air service between Canada and the defaulting state;
> (b) where an air carrier is an air carrier of the defaulting state, operating a commercial air service between Canada and any other state;
> (c) flying across Canadian territory, if the flight is coming from or going to the defaulting state;
>
> (d) landing in Canada, if the flight is coming from or going to the defaulting state;
>
> (e) where an air carrier is an air carrier of the defaulting state, flying across Canadian territory; or
> (f) where an air carrier is an air carrier of the defaulting state, landing in Canada.

So various remedies are provided for in the bill.

In subclause (3) "unlawful act" is defined. In other words, there is a definition of hijacking. In subclause (4), for the purposes of defining what is an unlawful act, there is the definition of what "aircraft in flight" means.

● (1450)

Clause 4 is rather important. Since the intention of this legislation is to impose these sanctions against a defaulting state, if the defaulting state remedies its offence, then, as you will see, honourable senators, clause 4 allows the Governor in Council to amend or repeal any order that he has made under proposed subsection 3(1).

Clause 5 is the penalty clause; that is, it stipulates the penalty for an air carrier failing to comply with an order made under proposed subsection 3(1). In other words, one of our own air carriers, or any air carrier that would be within Canada's jurisdiction, that fails to comply with an order made under the clause referred to, is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $10,000.

Clause 6 deals with the coming into force of the act.

The understanding among the states is that the provisions of clause 3 would be triggered, in Canada's case, by an action of the Department of External Affairs. That would be the result of close consultation with the other six governments. Honourable senators will remember that the plans and intentions under the Bonn Declaration were for consultative action; that is, not unilateral action, but the triggering of the consultative process, with sanctions resulting therefrom.

As I have mentioned, the problem has been that under the Bonn Declaration, although there were certain offences of the prescribed type, those consultative processes were never triggered to the point of actually doing anything, and so the intention of this bill would be to bring about close consultation with the other six governments, each of which would be monitoring and assessing the follow-up to any given hijacking incident. Essentially, the consultative process would be undertaken by the embassies of the seven states.

Dealing with the mechanics as they are envisaged, based on the advice of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport, the Governor in Council would be in a position to determine what prohibitive action might be appropriate in the circumstances set out in clause 3, and in exceptionally serious cases all six prohibitions could be invoked.

As I have mentioned, clause 4 provides for the amendment or repeal of any order made under proposed subsection 3(1).

The philosophy, then, behind the bill, is that it is desirable to enact specific legislation to implement the Bonn Declaration, even though existing powers would permit the kind of action required by the declaration. However, those powers—the suspension of bilateral air agreements and revocation of orders under the National Transportation Act—have not previously been used for purposes of severing commercial air links. Because of the often fast-moving and unpredictable nature of hijacking incidents, the government should have available a procedure that is clearly established in advance and that can be implemented on short notice.

Honourable senators, the bill provides for drastic measures. The draftsmen of the bill, and the nations who are parties to the agreements that led to the bill, believe that in situations that often involve loss of life and the taking of innocent hostages, drastic measures are called for. Honourable senators will see this kind of measure in the context of the two already established remedies for dealing with international terrorism. One of these, of course, is the improvement of security at airports. I think it is safe to say that there has been an upgrading in this area in many countries. Many of us experience it every time we fly. The second remedy I refer to is that of international co-operation in developing multilateral anti-terrorist agreements, such as The Hague Convention and the Bonn Declaration.

In my respectful submission, honourable senators, the bill that is before you for consideration now is another step in this direction. The essential element to be considered here is the obligation to extradite or prosecute hijackers, and also, of course, to return the aircraft, because, as honourable senators realize, some nations who cynically declare that they are against hijacking will accept hijackers and will fail to prosecute them, or, if they prosecute them, will not extradite them, and then will not return an aircraft worth millions of dollars to its rightful owner. Such an attitude can constitute a very profitable bit of nose-thumbing at international morality—

Senator Roblin: It is piracy.

Senator Frith: —and is nothing less than piracy—precisely. It is what might be dignified by the description of "white collar" or "diplomatic" piracy.

I have one last comment, honourable senators. I respectfully suggest to honourable senators that this is an appropriate time to bring this measure before the Senate—and it is a Senate bill, as you will have noted—because Canada will be meeting next week in Venice with the other signatories. I do not urge passage of the bill in time for that meeting, although it certainly would not hurt.

Honourable senators, I commend the bill to your favourable consideration.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: You have referred to drastic measures contained in the bill, and to acts of piracy, yet the fine is not to exceed $10,000. That seems to me to be rather a mild penalty in view of the nature of the offence. Could you make some comment on that? Is that in line with what the other countries are doing? Why is the fine only $10,000?

Senator Frith: I do not know why the fine has been set at $10,000, but certainly it has to be looked at in the context of clause 3. You must also remember that when we are talking about a fine of $10,000 we are not talking about a fine imposed on the hijacker or on the hijacking nation: we are talking about $10,000 for every breach of an order that follows an international hijacking. The fine is for each offence, and I suppose it is conceivable that the offence could be construed as happening every day, and so the fine could accumulate. That would, of course, involve sequential prosecutions, because the bill does not say "per day of an offence."

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I intend to move the adjournment of the debate, but before doing so I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill this question. Has there been any case in the last ten years in Canada where we would have had to use this kind of legislation had it been in existence?

Senator Frith: Yes, I believe there has been. I will try to find out specifically for the Honourable Senator Flynn before his intervention in the debate. I have checked, and I know that there have been approximately 17 hijackings since the Bonn Declaration. The question is: In those particular circumstances, would we have been able to invoke this provision, because of overflights, landing rights, and so on? I will try to find out.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved that the report be now adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I think I should give a brief explanation, since you might get the impression from this report that the entire Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is going to move to Canberra. If that were true, we would certainly have the largest turnout of the committee in its history. I do not think that those who are going to Canberra regard this as a junket, because it will involve flying for 27 hours straight, and then holding four days of intensive meetings on highly technical subjects. In fact, the committee agreed that only the two co-chairmen should go, along with the vice-chairman, Mr. Kenneth Robinson, Mr. Svend Robinson, who is the other member of the steering committee, as a representative of the NDP, and Mr. Walter Baker, who has taken a great interest in the work of the committee for the last few years and who has been a faithful attendant. In fact, then, only five members are going, plus legal counsel to the committee and one senior officer from the Privy Council Office who is concerned with the enactment of regulations.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CONSTITUTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider and report upon constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and upon the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

That the membership of the committee be increased to thirty members and that Rule 67(1)(j) be suspended in relation to membership of the committee;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the first paragraph of the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "upon" in the second line and substituting the following therefor:—

"the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights".—(Honourable Senator Asselin).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, for almost three weeks now we have been considering a motion of Senator Lamontagne to which is appended an amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition. The amendment of the official opposition merely completes the main motion adding, in my opinion, some important substance to the debate on the constitutional review, namely the division of powers and juridictions between the central government and the provinces.

Since the beginning of the debate, the opposition has tried on several occasions to emphasize the validity of its amendment. It is one of the times where I have been unable to discover the basic reason why the government is rejecting the amendment of the official opposition but perhaps our friends opposite have been specifically instructed by the authorities, the party or the government to hang tight. Therefore, honourable senators, the appropriateness of the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition is now more obvious, I think, especially since the meeting between the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada which took place in Ottawa about ten days ago.

A consideration of the statements made by the provincial premiers after the conference, shows that they tended to talk about the recognition by the federal government of the rights of the provinces over mines and marine resources, natural resources, fisheries and communications and that several premiers considered that recognition as a sine qua non condition to the success of the constitutional talks which will take place in September. There will have to be an agreement on the distribution of powers and jurisdictions in these fields.

Indeed, honourable senators, all the commissions—and God knows there have been many of them—that were created by the federal government to look into the matter of constitutional reform always agreed and always came to the same conclusion that it was absolutely necessary, if we wanted to achieve a new federalism, to agree on the division of jurisdictions and try to find a way of balancing the powers of the federal government and the provinces.

You will remember the conclusions of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1972. The Pepin-Robarts Task Force reached the same result. If you want to talk about Bill C-60, its conclusions point in the same direction, and apart from linguistic and collective rights, and the reorganization of certain federal institutions, the focus of discussion of those commissions of enquiry was indeed the distribution of powers.

We allowed Senator Lamontagne to change his motion by making another speech. When we look at the speech he delivered last Thursday, I tell myself this is the most vibrant plea Senator Lamontagne ever made in support of the amendment of the official opposition.

Senator Lamontagne, as you will remember, if you go over what he said last week, talked of federalism but called the existing federalism a federalism of tutorship—an expression I had not heard in a long, long time—while he was a father of the co-operative federalism of 1960.

In addition, when you talk of a federalism of tutorship, you implicitly admit the federal government got into fields of provincial jurisdiction and those new jurisdictions must absolutely be divided. So you have to talk about a division of powers.

When we talk of spending powers, powers to legislate, declaratory powers, powers of disallowance, powers of rights of veto, all powers which belong to the central government, Senator Lamontagne will not have me believe that they are not being discussed and examined very seriously by provincial authorities, and I would even say, federal authorities.

To correct his federalism of tutorship, he will have to touch the jurisdiction of powers to allow the provinces to participate in the major decisions of the central government. To do that, Senator Lamontagne would institutionalize federal-provincial conferences in a legal and political structure.

I think there is no way out of it. If he wants to create a permanent conference which might be called the confederal council, he must absolutely deal with the distribution of powers. Furthermore, if you look at last week's Hansard, at page 465, where Senator Lamontagne was talking about the three elements of his motion, you will see that he said the third element was——to develop a new mechanism which henceforth would allow provincial governments to have control over the exercise of the extraordinary powers the federal government has in their fields of jurisdiction which is another matter, I think, than the reform of the Senate as a purely federal institution.

• (1510)

How, honourable senators, could Senator Lamontagne in his third element talk about holding, controlling and exercising extraordinary powers the federal government has without dealing precisely with the famous issue of the distribution of powers? His plea, what I call his plea, implicitly endorses the amendment Senator Flynn introduced on behalf of the official opposition.

Also, at page 464, Senator Lamontagne, referring to his motion, talks about the role that the Senate should play:

> —the future role and composition of the Senate, not as a confederal body but as a genuine federal institution. More particularly, it should consider how this chamber could play a specific role in the areas of the official languages and regional interests and aspirations. We have talked about Senate reform for many years. Now, in my view, is the time for action. We should not be ashamed of presenting concrete proposals for Senate reform; after all, many other groups have done so although I—

However, when Senator Lamontagne speaks of considering a reform of the Senate, I have the feeling that he should have thought about the special Senate committee established in 1978, more precisely on October 11 of that year, when this assembly agreed to the following motion, which was moved by Senator Stanbury and seconded by Senator van Roggen:

> That a Special Committee of the Senate, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution, be appointed to consider and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-60, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution of Canada with respect to matters coming within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada and so on.

A committee made up of 30 members therefore studied the provisions of the bill on constitutional reform, especially sections 56 and 57, which provided for a reform of the Senate and the replacement of this assembly by a new House of the Federation. This committee of 30 members presided over by Senator Stanbury worked for many hours, heard witnesses and studied the various reports. Unfortunately, because of the dissolution of Parliament, it did not have an opportunity to table its report.

I asked the government deputy leader last week what was happening to this committee. I asked why the committee of Senator Stanbury had not been reappointed so that the Senate might receive its report and learn of the findings of its studies. I have been informed that the report is already nearly completed. It was drafted by experts. Honourable senators, why should we not allow the Senate to move that the committee of Senator Stanbury be reconstituted and that it table its report in this assembly so that we may know about its findings? Perhaps we might have some answers about the composition of a new Senate, a new upper chamber. We might have the answers to all the questions asked by Senator Lamontagne. We might also have some answers about what new studies recommend for the new upper chamber.

I have the impression that by refusing to reconstitute the Stanbury committee, the Senate is showing a lack of confidence in this committee, because Senator Stanbury and 30 other senators used all their energies and talents to study the same question that Senator Lamontagne would want to submit to a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I believe that it is time for the Senate to take itself seriously. These comments are addressed especially to the Deputy Leader of the Government. We should not establish study committees just to please a certain senator or group of senators and to be able to tell this senator or these senators that he or they will sponsor a new study by the Senate about the issue of a new upper chamber.

I believe that if we want to act seriously we shall have to stop the favouritism shown occasionally by the representatives of the government.

Senator Lamontagne tells us that this committee will have to report by August 1. To whom will it report? Apparently, the Senate will not be sitting on August 1. We have been told that both Houses might adjourn some time between July 15 and 30. In that case, to whom could this committee report? To the government or to the meeting of first ministers which will be held in September? What assurance do we have that, for once, the government will be ready to listen, or even to read or study the recommendations of the Senate? I am not making any exception in this case, because neither the Progressive Conservative government nor the Liberal government have paid much attention to what has been done by the Senate in the past since the numerous, valuable and laudable studies made by the Senate have nearly always been shelved by the government of the day.

This time if we decide on spending taxpayers' money and senators' time working throughout July on a committee that would be established pursuant to Senator Lamontagne's motion, we should determine beforehand what assurances we have from this government that our consideration or recommendations will be seriously considered by the government and that they will later be submitted to the First Ministers Conference in September.

But we have no such assurances. And this means that the committee may sit throughout July on that issue, with the result that the report will be tabled during next session, when the September Conference of First Ministers is over. Decisions may have been taken meanwhile and once more we wil have missed the boat.

As I said, honourable senators, it is my view that Senator Stanbury should be allowed to reconvene his committee. I think we owe this to him. He exerted tremendous effort and talent—and as he happens to be coming into the house I am pleased to tell him this—he devoted a lot of effort and talent during the last session to the study of Bill C-60, the constitutional reform legislation. And now we do not even bother to set up his committee again on a temporary basis to enable him to table that committee's conclusions.

If I were in Senator Stanbury's shoes, I would not be too happy with my colleagues' attitude. My very dear friends, we on this side of the house, obviously support a renewed federal-

ism. How many studies have been made on this subject over the last 10 years? In my view, it should be our responsibility to try to bring all parts which make up Canada together again, in the hope that the provinces and the federal government can agree on issues as important as the renewal of the upper chamber, and especially the matter of distribution of powers, which was raised by Senator Flynn.

I therefore call upon the deputy government leader to explain why he, as a government representative, will not support the official opposition's amendment. He is just about the only one who took a clear stand, because when the question was put to him, or I should say to the government leader, the government leader dodged the answer and adopted a wait-and-see attitude, on the assumption that there may be developments in the course of the debate which would make it possible to agree on a modus vivendi. But the only one who rose and said "No, we will never accept the amendment" was the deputy government leader.

Senator Frith: I did not say "never". You will not find the word "never".

Senator Asselin: You said "no".

Senator Frith: Is that my intention? No.

Senator Asselin: So I think I have stressed the necessity, if one wants to undertake an in-depth and intelligent study of this important question raised by Senator Lamontagne, if one wants this Senate subcommittee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to accomplish some serious work, I think that one has to come to grips with the core of the problem of federalism and that is precisely the issue of the sharing of powers. I hope that the Deputy Leader of the Government will answer frankly and that he will give us the basic reasons why he does not want to deal with the very essence of the problem. He simply wants to tell us: We have a new formula to offer towards the establishment of a new House of Federation or a renewed Senate. I can tell you one thing: If the reform of the Senate is the only issue stalling the constitutional reform process next September I can tell you in advance that the consent of the provinces and the federal government will be quickly obtained when it comes to the renewal of the Senate.

So let us not waste our time, I repeat, let us come to grips with this problem and let us try to bring to this September conference—if we get the guarantee that we will be listened to—let us try to bring the fruits of our studies, of our work, in order to allow the federal government and the provinces to agree and finally find a solution to the renewal of our Canadian federalism.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Asselin would permit a question. In his endeavour to resuscitate the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution, is he aware that the second phase of the study that committee conducted did not reach any agreement on any of the major issues of Senate reform? If my memory serves me correctly, we found common agreement or consensus on only one aspect of Senate reform, which was to increase its membership from 104 to 118. There was no consensus on tenure of office, method of appointment or the functions of the Senate, although several solutions were suggested. That committee did not reach any conclusion. Even though it came to the end of its study of Bill C-60, it did not formulate any specific recommendations, and it appeared to me that there was no consensus or agreement on any major reforms.

As a matter of fact, I should like to ask Senator Asselin if he is aware that Senator Godfrey once said, "Tell me who is going to be on the committee on Senate or constitutional reform and I will tell you what kind of report you are likely to get."

Senator Asselin: I understood that when this special committee was formed the purpose was to study Bill C-60. I am not able to answer with the precision for which the honourable senator is asking. He should ask the honourable senator who was the chairman of that committee to answer his questions. At least we should reconstitute this committee, which had begun to study not only Senate reform but other constitutional questions also. If the honourable senator who was the chairman of that committee wants to answer Senator Bosa's question, I shall be very pleased to listen to him.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, perhaps I should take this opportunity, not specifically to answer Senator Bosa's question—although my remarks may constitute an answer—but to explain my own attitude towards the motion now before the Senate.

It is quite right to say that originally the special committee was established to study Bill C-60. However, there was a report on that aspect of our study, and that aspect was completed. The committee was then reconstituted for the purpose of continuing the study of constitutional reform, and it decided to take as the first item after Bill C-60 the possibility of developing reforms of the Senate itself. Senator Bosa is correct in saying that in terms of actually finalizing the report, which developed a consensus on most of these issues, we did not quite finish it before the penultimate election was called. We had had a great deal of discussion. My own feeling is that we could have come to some conclusions, but we did not.

When honourable senators re-read the draft of the second report, which was not finalized, it will be perfectly obvious that you would have to go right back to square one, reconstitute the committee and begin again. The report goes back two years, since that time there have been new members appointed to the Senate. It would be a lengthy process.

It was because of that that when Senator Lamontagne spoke to me about his thought of constituting a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to deal with the one specific problem, it was attractive to me. When it was first discussed with me it was on the basis of one particular problem.

Senator Asselin: You are speaking about three now.

Senator Stanbury: I know, and perhaps that is where we got off the track. We started to broaden it from one, to two, to three. Had we kept it to the one problem, my own feeling is that the Leader of the Opposition and other members of the opposition would have found it as attractive to them as it was to me. We studied Bill C-60.

● (1530)

Then we saw coming down the track towards us the recommendations of the British Columbia government, the Canadian Bar Association committee, the Pepin-Robarts Report, and so forth, and all the funny suggestions that they were making regarding a second chamber—that it be a House of the Provinces, or a House of the Federation, or something of that kind. As we saw the elements that they were building into these proposals, I think all of us in the committee realized that they were making an horrendous mistake; that they had misunderstood the functioning of a second chamber.

It was Senator Lamontagne's suggestion which convinced me that, if we acted quickly and formulated a positive recommendation on this one point before the federal and provincial governments got seriously into their discussions—discussions which would culminate, to some extent at least, in September—we could make a real contribution to those discussions. I say that because we were the only ones who could see clearly this terrible mistake that they were going to make, and we could see it because of our experience and involvement in this area.

I agree completely that if it were a matter of simply wiping out the Senate and thereby solving all constitutional problems, every one of us would vote immediately to wipe out the Senate. But that is not the problem. We were not trying to save the Senate. What we were trying to do was to see how in the world we could persuade these people to see that if they did what they proposed, they would make a terrible mistake for the future of Canada. I am convinced of that myself.

It was Senator Lamontagne's brilliant idea, in my opinion, that if we could take that one aspect of it and make a rational argument which could not be denied by the governments which were going through these negotiations, and if we could accomplish it before the summer recess, we would have then made a constructive contribution towards the solution of Canada's constitutional problems. That was precisely why I agreed with Senator Lamontagne in bringing forward this motion.

Personally, I would be perfectly happy if we dropped the other aspects of the matter and concentrated solely on that one aspect of it. If it makes people more comfortable to say we are going to deal with a couple of other things too, that is fine. However, my own feeling is that we should deal with that aspect of it, and then set up the Constitution Committee. I do not feel any sense of proprietary rights to the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, but I think that once we have done the job that has to be done, and once we see what kind of progress the federal-provincial conferences are making, then we can see where we can make the greatest contribution. At the moment, the real need is to make that rational presentation, setting out the problems they are going to get into if they do not understand the distinction between a second legislative chamber and a House of the Provinces, or some animal of that kind that they were about to create.

Honourable senators, that was my rationale. I hope you will support the motion, because I think it is our only real opportunity to make a contribution before it is too late.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two on this. I feel that possibly the wrong impression may have been left as far as the progress of the work of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution is concerned. I say that, bearing in mind particularly what Senator Bosa has said, and possibly what Senator Stanbury has said.

It is true that we had not reached an actual agreement on the drafting or writing of the report. Around December 1, 1978 we decided that we would not meet again until after Christmas. We were then informed that the Attorneys General were going to meet on the proposals contained in Bill C-60, and that we should advise them of our views on the broad issues of Senate reform. We had two or three meetings on that, and we agreed on the major issues. Senator Stanbury was then instructed to discuss them verbally with the Honourable John Reid, who was meeting with the provincial Attorneys General. So, we did come to a general consensus on the major issues. It was just the nitty-gritty dealing with the actual drafting of the report which held us up. We did reach a consensus in the former committee.

[Translation]

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: If you will allow a question, Senator Asselin, I did not take part in the debate—

Senator Asselin: I accept all questions which are said to be interesting.

Senator Goldenberg: I did not take part in the debate and I do not intend to, but, as I understand it, you said that agreeing to Senator Lamontagne's motion would mean that we would not get a report before August 1, and therefore we would not be able to report to the Senate because the Senate then will not be sitting. This takes us to September when the first ministers' conference will be held. You are right.

Here is my question: If we enlarge the terms of reference of the committee to include the all too well-known complex issue of the division of powers, when will the subcommittee be able to submit a report? Not before September. I am not arguing for or against, I just want to ask you the question. You are a member of the committee, and you were in the past, and I greatly appreciated the work you did. That is why I am asking this question.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I was asking myself the same thing. Do you not think that we are going to look a little ridiculous in the eyes of the Canadian people if we consider only one aspect, as Senator Stanbury suggested, namely what, in the Senate's opinion, should become of the upper house to meet the requirements of the provinces. We will not have time to reach a concensus on a new formula for the upper house nor will we have time to present a full report on the distribution of powers. I fully agree with you: to avoid all this and so that we do not give the impression of being the kind of people interested only in producing reports, I say that we should refer this to the special committee on the matter which was already established. Rather than having Senator Lamontagne propose this motion, why was the special committee simply not asked to continue its work and report on the question that he wants to discuss.

It seems to me that we are wasting time. We are also wasting the taxpayers' money. Two committees will be studying the same thing and we are going to say: When are they going to produce their report? According to Senator Lamontagne, it has to come out by August 1. But by that date the Senate will likely not be sitting. That is what he said in his speech. To whom then will the report be presented? To the government? How can we be sure that the government will consider our recommendations? It has not done so in the past—neither the Liberal nor the Conservative government has considered Senate recommendations; they never do. How can we be assured that they will this time? So why duplicate? We already have a special committee that can be re-established in one minute to convene and study the issue raised by Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I readily accept the invitation extended to me by my colleague, Senator Asselin, to explain why a week ago I answered a question which, if my memory serves me well, was as follows: Do you intend to support the amendment? If I remember well, honourable senators then complained that we on this side did not answer specifically nor directly when asked questions on this matter. At least it can be said that my answer was not too long since I only said "no", didn't I? Unfortunately, I did not say "never".

Senator Asselin: If I stated you said "never", then I withdraw, and your "no" remains.

Senator Frith: I did not intend at that time to say "never", but I am sorry I cannot say now that I changed my mind. I simply want to explain why I said that I intended, and still intend, not to support the amendment.

I do not want to indulge in pettifoggery, but in the legal field the purpose of pleadings is to define the issues. In my opinion, we are on the point of getting some clarification on the differences between the senators who support the amendment and those who are against.

● (1550)

In my opinion, we have just about reached the point in this debate where we will know which senators intend to support the amendment and vote against the motion, and which senators intend to support Senator Lamontagne's motion. In my opinion, this is clear because as in any defence speech counsel may start with the points on which all parties agree. The fact of the matter is that, in this process to renew the Constitution, the Senate is specifically involved every step of the way. Time has come to stress the diverging views. Our position is that we accept readily that every aspect of our Constitution should be of interest to the Senate and its members.

[Senator Asselin.]

But we want to play a specific role in this process. To begin with, we should focus our expertise and ideas on a single aspect. This way, we could come up with suggestions and for the time being concentrate our capacity to work on a single aspect of the question.

It is hoped that within a month the three aspects described by Senator Lamontagne will be dealt with. It is certainly not my intention to refuse, deny or restrict the scope of the study that is perfectly acceptable in every other respect. So far, I also want to extend my sincere congratulations to Senator Asselin and Senator Tremblay on having explained clearly the reason why they support the amendment introduced by Senator Flynn.

In his speech Senator Asselin even clarified the political reason, and I use the term "political" in a general sense and not in a restricted one, for supporting the amendment. Moreover, he emphasized that, from a theoretical point of view, we simply must look into the division of powers before we deal with the power of disallowance, for instance, or other federal powers which, according to Senator Lamontagne, are worth examining.

In my opinion, even from a technical point of view, one may say, "Not necessarily". One may put forward a cogent argument from a theoretical point of view and say why such a point of view is being stressed.

This is the difference between those who reject and those who support the amendment. It is not a matter which is completely dimensionless. I understand very well the dimensions which were explained by Senator Asselin and Senator Tremblay as well as by Senator Flynn, but finally, we must decide what is in the balance, and the balance seems to be tipping in favour of a concentrated study on the more restricted aspects at the present time. Then, we shall perhaps be able to continue with the other aspects.

As to reconstituting Senator Stanbury's committee, I have little to add except that to be fair towards Senator Asselin, he even said that "possibly" some duplication would result. But he did not insist.

In brief, honourable senators, that is why we must support the motion and vote against the amendment. Furthermore, and I do not want to repeat it again, these are the reasons why I think that our contribution to the debate should be restricted now to the question of the renewal of the Constitution which will be better served by a study as proposed by Senator Lamontagne.

● (1600)

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask a question of Senator Frith?

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Deschatelets: When I examine the motion of Senator Lamontagne, if I understand correctly, I see that it comprises three elements. Consider, first, constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights; second, the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate, and, third, alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism, and report thereon.

I have read once again the explanations given last Thursday by Senator Lamontagne about his third item. Could you tell us, Senator Frith, how you understand this third item which reads as follows:

> —and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism.

Because if this is the mandate given the committee, what you call "terms of reference", I have to say that this third element does not seem clear to me. I do not know what it means exactly. Could you give me some explanations as to how you understand this third element of the motion?

Senator Frith: My impression is that the second and third items are related. They are related as explained by Senator Stanbury, in that the future role of the Senate raises necessarily the question of the participation of the provinces in the appointment of senators, pursuant, for instance, to the provisions of Bill C-60 which provided for a provincial participation.

It is in this context that we must understand the meaning of the word "alternative," that is to direct provincial participation in the operation of the Senate. We must not forget nor deny the participation of the provinces. Bill C-60 sought to protect the provinces against federal intrusions through another formula to ensure provincial participation directly in the Senate. In this context, the third item included, for example, the alternative mentioned in the speech of Senator Lamontagne last Thursday, that is to institutionalize. You have noted that even if the word is French, I said it with an English pronunciation.

Senator Asselin: It is quite good.

Senator Frith: To institutionalize the conferences and provincial-federal agreements. Those are the links between the three items and it is in this context that we must understand the word "alternative".

Senator Deschatelets: I apologize, honourable senators, but I want this to be quite clear in my mind. I want once again to clarify that point. Let us say that the committee will get along with this restrictive threefold mandate: first, second and third, the third one being related to the second. So if at a given time a member of the committee wants, for instance, to discuss the sharing of powers, he cannot do it.

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Deschatelets: Do you agree with that?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Deschatelets: That is what I would like to know. Let us say we give a committee a mandate which we will call terms of reference one, two, three. You explained to us that number three is related to number two namely the constitution of the Senate. So I clearly and quite simply want to know if at a given time a committee member says: Well, here it is the Premiers or the ministers in charge of constitutional affairs are at present discussing the sharing of powers, I would like that issue to be debated. Will he be out of order with regard to the restrictive mandate they were given?

Senator Asselin: He will not be able to discuss it.

Senator Frith: I think he can discuss the distribution of powers only in the context suggested by Senator Asselin, that is, if he can persuade the chairman and committee members that it cannot discuss alternative ways to avoid the exercise of such federal powers as that of disallowance, or declaratory powers, without discussing the distribution of powers. I think we need not discuss the distribution of powers when discussing the issue of the power of disallowance or that of declaratory powers. We must remember, however that it is only in the context of the alternatives that we even start discussing the power of dissallowance. It is only when the power of disallowance and the declaratory powers are involved that we have an example of the exercise of such federal power. In fact, the distribution of powers between sections 91 and 92 is not usually discussed before the courts when it is a matter of disallowance—although recently no government has had the courage, or perhaps the folly to try to exercise it—or perhaps a matter of declaratory powers, since it is a matter that comes under section 92—if it is a provincial power—the federal government can then declare that it is a matter of federal interest and it then must be "removed" from section 92 for that case.

It is a long answer, and I am sorry but it is a rather technical question. The only thing I want to say is that, in my opinion at least, the analysis Senator Asselin made today can be raised before the committee. The answer must be that it is not in order but it is up to the committee and the chairman to decide. I do not mean that I do not understand the view of Senator Asselin which was, I think, behind your question.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I would also like to get a clarification from Senator Frith. Will we have to interpret the motion to mean that not only do we not discuss the matter of division of powers but we deem it resolved. I refer to the following passage of Senator Lamontagne's speech when he explained that we were within a system of federalism of tutorship and he wonders how to approach its renewal, he puts the following question. He says:

> For example, all groups I just mentioned recognize that the central government should retain its spending and declaratory powers.

He would have previously used the powers of denial. I think he included that also. There is the residual power. The general power to legislate for an emergency or simply even in the national interest. There is a whole series of general powers. So what Senator Lamontagne mentions are only examples.

But this is not the point I wish to raise.

> keep the spending and the declaratory powers it now has in order to maintain some flexibility within the whole political system.

I ask this question: Those comments seem to take for granted that the general powers in question are maintained. So, the question is resolved. And it also implies that the third option of his proposal finds its meaning in this context. How could we accept such a working and thinking procedure? We are told that the terms of reference should be restricted to such an extent while it is assumed that the matter of division of powers is already settled. This, I think, is just what Senator Asselin was referring to earlier. It shows that the division of powers and the debate on an alternative to the Senate such as the type of institution mentioned by Senator Lamontagne, are two inextricably related issues. It is evidenced by the fact that Senator Lamontagne is assuming that this issue has been settled to provide for his alternative. I should like some explanation in that respect.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with respect, I think that this issue is based on a lack of understanding concerning the question of the division of powers. Maybe it is not a lack of understanding but it certainly is a misconception. It is caused by the following reasons: Normally, when we talk about division of powers, we talk about the titles listed in sections 92 and 93. In every case, they refer to "the following matters". That is clearly understood.

Senator Tremblay: Yes.

Senator Frith: Now, within the context of Senator Lamontagne's intervention, as far as federal powers are concerned, it was not a question of titles but of general powers. Am I right? I mean the power of denial, or the declaratory power, for instance.

Senator Tremblay: They are listed.

Senator Frith: No, they are not.

Senator Tremblay: As an exception to the article.

Senator Frith: Exactly, as an exception only.

Senator Tremblay: As well as the declaratory powers.

Senator Frith: The declaratory power provides for the case when a power is listed in the division of powers as being within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but may for any reason of national interest, be withdrawn from that list. This is another example which sets up differences of opinion in the constitutional field. However, I accept the premise put forward by senator Lamontagne that certain powers namely the power of disallowance and the declaratory power must remain under federal jusrisdiction. Otherwise, there can be no federalism of course. But the distribution of specific powers such as, for instance, property and civil rights and so on is a different thing altogether in the opinion of Senator Lamontagne, if I understood him well, and in my opinion as well.

Senator Asselin: And in the opinion of Senator Goldenberg.

Senator Frith: Of course. A study of the distribution of specific powers is not necessarily a part of a study about alternative arrangements, as I explained to Senator Deschatelets.

● (1610)

Senator Tremblay: My question is also for clarification purposes. If I did understand correctly what Senator Frith has just explained, there would be no federalism if the general powers did not belong to the central government. Am I correct in my assumption? What I want to know is this: Am I wrong when I state that among the 17 federations which are found in the world, only two of them give residuary powers, for example, to their central government? The other 15 give them to the provinces, to the member states. Are these federations not to be considered as real federations, and should the other two, one of them being Canada, which grant the residuary power to their central government, be considered as such? It seems to me that the United States would object.

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Frith: Once again, honourable senators, that is a misinterpretation of what is meant when general powers are discussed. Normally, there are three classes of powers, in my opinion, within such a state, and shared by both legislative bodies. There are first the specific titles, the "Matters coming within Classes of Subjects," as they are called in our Constitution. Secondly, to whom do the residual powers belong? In the United States, they belong to the various states. Historically, it is said that when the Fathers of Confederation studied the United States Constitution, they decided that what they wanted was a more centralized government. This is so stated in the documents. Hence, residual powers were left with the central government. Thirdly, the national power or the general power, like the declaratory power or the disclaiming power were also ascribed, by necessity, to the central government. Those are the three classes of powers.

This is why I said that if some general powers are not ascribed to the federal level—the answers to the first two questions do not matter, that is the specific titles, the residual powers—there is no federation, in my opinion. Otherwise, why should there be? If three or four states say they want to form a nation, they have to relinquish certain general powers which in spite of the sharing of powers surpass local issues. Such is my opinion, I can assure you, but still I am not pretending that I was handed down these answers on top of Mount Sinai.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this debate may already have lasted too long but having moved an amendment to the main motion, I think I should add a few words to explain the scope of this amendment.

I was feeling at times that the debate is of a rather semantic nature. However, Senator Frith corrected me in part by saying that the committee would not be able to discuss the field of power sharing since this would be outside its terms of reference. To me, this has confirmed the need for the amendment I moved.

Senator Lang was the first to address the Senate after I did. He was shocked. He said the proposals were childish and nonsensical. He was angry like I never saw him before, though his attitude was amusing. He reminded us that it took the Rowell-Sirois Commission eight years to report. I think he should check his information because it only lasted two and a half years and its terms of reference were not to review the whole matter of power sharing, but only to determine whether the federal government was in a better position than the provinces to legislate in and administer certain areas.

Since that time, we had a lot of studies made. We had the Tremblay Commission in Quebec City. We also had the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission which touched upon that. We had the Pepin-Robarts Commission. We had Bill C-60. Obviously, we have ample material to review the division of powers. This is no impossible task for the Senate.

Again, what I dislike about Senator Lamontagne's proposal is that it wants the Senate simply to examine the matter of the upper chamber in the context of negotiations on constitutional reform between the two levels of government. Then, you all wonder, honourable senators: Did we do a good job? Can we go on doing a good job? I think it is indeed childish to ask us for an opinion in the middle of the emergency situation created by the present government when it set that September deadline. We already expressed our opinion many times, as mentioned by Senator Asselin when he referred to the joint committee of 1972 and our report on Bill C-60.

What happens is that Senator Lamontagne is actually taking for granted—this is what worries me, and I think he reflects the Prime Minister's feelings—that the division of powers will remain unchanged. Indeed, the Prime Minister said: Everything is negotiable, except that. Such was his stand on Bill C-60. It will be recalled that Bill C-60 took up exactly, word for word, sections 91 and 92 as well as the others. We now feel that what they are saying is this: the division of jurisdictions will not be changed at all. Only the institutions will be considered. I suggest that the institutions must be considered, studied and drawn up in terms of the division of jurisdictions.

Earlier, Senator Tremblay just wondered whether it was necessarily taken for granted that the federal government must retain the spending power, the power to state, as it does now, that such or such a thing is in the general interest, for instance, to expropriate, if it is convenient for the government, the oil fields of Alberta, if it is unable to come to an agreement that would allow it to save face following the promises it made and the stands it took, that the party took during the last election, simply to save face. Is this what they want to retain? I say no. I say that the question of a second house will be considered in terms of what is expected of the two levels of government, in terms of the division of jurisdictions.

I find Senator Lamontagne's proposal unbelievable, unless one reads it differently, as Senator Frith said, because I am convinced that this committee should be able to consider the Senate in terms of a division of jurisdictions which is not necessarily the same as that provided in the British North America Act. Otherwise, it is not worth it, since that is not the matter under discussion at the present. That is not what the provinces are interested in. That is not what British Columbia, Alberta, and especially Quebec, are interested in. Do not expect Quebecers to say that they have faith in Canada simply because the Senate will be changed and replaced by a federal house as proposed in Bill C-60 or even in the beige paper. That is not true. This question of a second chamber has no interest whatsoever for Quebecers. The question is the distribution of jurisdictions. It is on that aspect that we must express an opinion.

I do not see why we should not be able to express an opinion. Again I say that many studies have been made on that subject. The Pepin-Robarts Task Force and the beige paper make that proposition, so why not study that?

Even if we were to conclude that, generally speaking, the distribution of powers should be maintained as it is now in the British North America Act, if we did reach that conclusion we would have done an excellent job because we might have dispelled a lot of the confusion which may exist in certain fields. That I concede.

But surely there are adjustments to be made. We should at least look at what is going wrong, and that is not here. I suggest that the Senate as a non-elected chamber cannot survive long. That is not true. It is in terms of the role to be assigned the two levels of government, of the way this second chamber will be set up, of how it will be made up and how its members will be elected or appointed that we will reach a conclusion.

I am really astonished at the resistance we have felt from the government about our amendment in this debate. I fail to understand that attitude because, if the amendment were accepted, nothing of course would prevent the committee from considering the problem of a second chamber. It has to be considered because the entire question of constitutional review stems from the resolution. Of course it has to be examined in light of the distribution of powers, but that does not restrict the mandate of the committee in any way. I am greatly surprised at so much opposition from the government.

In any event, if that is the attitude of the majority, it is too bad. But I do not believe that a limited mandate as interpreted by Senator Frith is likely to help the committee and enable us to do a good job.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to speak in sympathetic opposition to the amendment moved by the honourable and distinguished Leader of the Opposition. The motion put forth by Senator Lamontagne to establish a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to deal with constitutional matters is, admittedly, in a more restricted and narrow range than the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition.

The purpose of his resolution, as the Honourable Senator Lamontagne has pointed out, would be to have this subcommittee—and I think this is the general view of honourable senators in support of the resolution—act as a small study group, drawing primarily upon the Senate's own expertise and sources of information and research in order to prepare a report as soon as possible. That is the essence of the commendable initiative of Senator Lamontagne.

As I have said before, personally I am very sympathetic towards the intention behind the amendment advanced by Senator Flynn. I suggest, however, that at this juncture, with the difficult time constraints which exist, we should not attempt to duplicate the work of the Pepin-Robarts Commission, or the Rowell-Sirois Commission, or the labours of a large commission empowered to investigate every facet of constitutional change and reform. It is a personally held view, and a view held by many other senators, that to broaden the mandate of the subcommittee might dangerously water down the influence we can bring to bear on the issues which both the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers agreed should be resolved by September.

This does not preclude the discussion of other matters relating to constitutional change and reform and related subjects some time in the future—it does not rule that out at all. Indeed, there have been discussions in this chamber about completing the report of the special committee established a few months ago, prior to the election of May, 1979, and having that special committee complete its work. I think it may well be appropriate for the Senate to create a special committee somewhere down the line which could devote all of its time to studying the complicated issues across the entire constitutional spectrum. There have been suggestions made from time to time that we have a Senate standing committee on regional aspirations. Those are all ideas with some considerable merit.

However, because of the urgency associated with constitutional change, especially in light of the recent referendum, I wonder whether it is a useful idea that we concentrate and channel our expertise into an area that we are more qualified to handle than any other group in Canada, and that area is most assuredly the Canadian Senate and the status of the second chamber, which is a high-priority matter. It does not rule out the importance of all the other facets of constitutional change.

I have listened with some bemusement and bewilderment to the pronouncements which have been issuing from every section of the country—from universities and from regional groups—purporting to set out what should happen in this second chamber; and, frankly, some of the proposals are not founded on any knowledge whatsoever of what we do here, of how the Senate operates, of the history of the Senate, or of the reasons for its very existence. I think it is surprising that a number of people with impeccable intellectual and educational qualifications often make proposals which would make Parliament utterly unworkable.

Senator Flynn: But that is the proposal of your government contained in Bill C-60.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, I listened very attentively to your remarks, and I found them to be of real interest and value. I hope the same courtesy can be extended to me.

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of courtesy; it is a question of being precise.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is a deplorable lack of knowledge with respect to the work of second chambers in parliamentary systems. The work done here down through the years has not been self-serving; it has made an important contribution to the national constitutional dialogue—and I am referring to the work performed by senators with respect to the future role of the second chamber. That information is needed by the government and by Canadians in this important process in which we are now involved. It may be that there will be some critics in the land who will say, "Well, there's the Senate, concerned about its future!" Honourable senators know that if we had suffered from criticism and had been sensitive to that kind of chatter in the past, we would have gone out of existence long ago.

If we are to make a relevant contribution to the renewal of federalism in Canada within the given time frame—proposals are going before the provincial first ministers in September—we must have some of these ideas together by July 15. Is it really possible for us to review the entire range of constitutional options that are open, in every direction?

The suggestion here is to make the most efficient use of our time. We can only do that by establishing priorities. I believe that if we follow the list of priorities established by Senator Lamontagne in his motion, unamended, we will be serving the people of Canada in the best possible way that we can. We must serve them by giving expert advice in areas where we have special expertise. That does not rule out the possibility of expressing our views in other directions at a later time. This stringent time frame imposes on all of us across the country who are interested in constitutional change a very difficult work schedule.

I want to emphasize again that no one on this side questions the motives behind Senator Flynn's amendment. He has advanced many useful ideas on the subject of constitutional change during his long period of service here. But I believe that the main motion is the best vehicle, within the time limits agreed to by the first ministers, and I oppose Senator Flynn only in that spirit. We have only a few weeks to make certain that this body, which is more knowledgeable on the second chamber than any other body in this country, has its views set forth in good form for consideration, not only by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and his advisers but also by the first ministers in Canada. Therefore, with a great deal of reluctance, I oppose this amendment.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on the administration of the Small Businesses Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1979, pursuant to section 11 of the said Act, Chapter S-10, R.S.C., 1970.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTIONS IN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. In case any questions arise on the debate of Senator Lamontagne's motion yesterday, I should like to have your permission to correct certain words in the English translation. I am quite satisfied with the French version, but some words in the translation were either subject to my misunderstanding or, in some cases, I could not understand what they meant at all. My first correction does not, in fact, deal with Senator Lamontagne's motion but was a comment I made in reply to an intervention by Senator Roblin in connection with Bill S-7. At page 497, Senator Roblin intervened and said:

> It is piracy.

Then I thought I had agreed with him and said, "It is nothing less than piracy," whereas the script reads, ". . . and is nothing more than piracy." I think it may be more than piracy.

Turning to the debate on Senator Lamontagne's motion, the errors in translation—or what seem to me to be errors in translation—occur at pages 503 and 504. These were responses to questions. First, at page 503, the second paragraph of my comments in the first column should read as follows:

> It is in this context that we must understand the meaning of the word "alternative," that is to direct provincial participation in the operation of the Senate. We must not forget or deny the participation of the provinces. Bill C-60 sought to protect the provinces against federal intrusions through another formula to ensure provincial participation directly in the Senate. In this context, the third item included, for example, the alternative mentioned in the speech of Senator Lamontagne—

• (1410)

And so on. Then, in the second column, in reply to a question by Senator Deschatelets as to whether or not it would be in order to discuss distribution of powers in committee on the basis of the present mandate, the translation should read:

> I think he can discuss the distribution of powers only in the context suggested by Senator Asselin, that is if he can persuade the chairman and committee members that it cannot discuss alternative ways to avoid the exercise of such federal powers as that of disallowance, or declaratory powers, without discussing the distribution of powers. I think we need not discuss the distribution of powers when discussing the issue of the power of disallowance or that of declaratory powers.

Then dropping down one sentence:

> It is only when the power of disallowance and the declaratory powers are involved that we have an example of the exercise of such federal power.

Continuing:

> In fact, the distribution of powers between sections 91 and 92 is not usually discussed before the courts when it is a matter of disallowance—although recently no government has had the courage, or perhaps the folly to try to exercise it—or perhaps a matter of declaratory powers. Since it is a matter that comes under section 92—if it is a provincial power—the federal government can then declare that it is a matter of federal interest and it then must be removed from section 92 for that case.

Finally, in the next paragraph:

> It is a long answer, and I am sorry but it is a rather technical question. The only thing I want to say is that, in my opinion at least, the analysis Senator Asselin made today can be raised before the committee. I think the answer must be that it is not in order but it is up to the committee and the chairman to decide. I do not mean that I do not understand the view of Senator Asselin which was, I think, behind your question.

There is a small correction to be made on page 504. In reply to a question by Senator Tremblay, the first sentence of my reply, midway in the first column, should read:

> The declaratory power provides for the case when a power is listed in the division of powers as being within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but may for any reason—

And so on, to the end of the paragraph. My next intervention should read:

Of course. A study of the distribution of specific powers is not necessarily a part of a study about alternative arrangements—

In the second column, the third sentence of my reply should read:

There are first the specific titles, the "Matters coming within Classes of Subjects," as they are called in our Constitution.

Continuing further down:

In the United States, they belong to the various states.

There are some other corrections that I have made. Perhaps I can pass those and not bore honourable senators with them. They are small grammatical errors. I suggest, with your permission, honourable senators, that I pass them over, and the English version could so read.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is doing a good job as the Deputy Leader of the Government, but could he not also learn to make his own corrections instead of taking up the time of the house at such great length on things that are obvious errors and do not change the purport of what he said?

I respectfully suggest that you should just try making the corrections yourself next time, and then we will be able to get on with the business of the house a little quicker.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the point raised by Senator Walker is well taken. This is the first time I have done this since I have been here, and the only reason I did it now is that there were many legal and technical things that I thought might be the subject of discussion in the committee and which should be set straight. In principle, however, I agree entirely with what Senator Walker has said.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to raise a certain matter at this time.

It seems, after discussion with the Deputy Leader of the Government, that there is some disposition on the part of the Senate to conclude Item No. 7 this afternoon, the debate on the motion by Senator Lamontagne and the amendment thereto which I moved. In order to accommodate as many senators as possible, I would suggest that we agree to suspend the Question Period at approximately 2.40 o'clock, and then conclude the debate on Item No. 7 so that we may have the vote around 3 o'clock.

If this were to meet with the general approval of the Senate, we on this side would be prepared to proceed in this way.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his useful initiative.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Frith.]

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE BUDGET TABLED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, for Senator Hays, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving a budget of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, June 25, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question that should be directed, I presume, to the Honourable Minister of State for Economic Development. It concerns the negotiations that were conducted between Mr. Lalonde and Mr. Leitch. Do I understand that these negotiations have broken down, and have been postponed for something like a month? The only thing they could agree on was to continue the present agreement for one month. What should we understand from that?

● (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, part of the preamble to the question is correct and part of it is incorrect. The part that is correct is that the negotiators have failed to reach any long-term agreement to date. However, they have agreed, as Senator Flynn has suggested, to continue the present pricing arrangement for one month. But there is more to it than that. The negotiations, while they have not broken down, have reached a point where both sides have agreed to refer it to the first ministers at a meeting that will be held before the month expires. Although we do not have a precise date now, one will be set.

In addition to that, further negotiations will probably take place, up to the date of the first ministers meeting, between the provincial ministers of energy and the federal Minister of Energy, Mines, and Resources. I say "probably" because that is not certain. Certainly, in the meantime there will be further meetings of officials. I would not say that the discussions have broken down. They have not; they have moved into a new phase.

SHIPPING

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE SERVICE

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Because of the demands on shipping which exist now with development of energy in the north, could the minister tell us what his government is doing regarding the formation of a Canadian Merchant Marine Service?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, obviously that is too great a question for anyone to try to answer during the Question Period. I do not believe there has been any new declaration regarding the development of a Canadian Merchant Marine Service. There are, of course, a number of programs and other policy discussions going on respecting that subject. I do not want to be misquoted in saying that we are now discussing the establishment of a Canadian Merchant Marine Service, although some interest has been shown in that. As I said, the question is far too great to try to answer in the Question Period.

Senator Marshall: Recognizing the detailed answer that is required, perhaps the minister could provide the answer at a later date.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. There are 60,000 employees in the shipbuilding industry in Canada. In view of the high unemployment in Canada, and because subsidies offered to the shipbuilding industry will expire in June of this year, I wonder whether the government is going to do anything regarding the extension of the subsidy to the shipbuilding industry to ensure that jobs are maintained.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will refer that question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport, both of whom are responsible for that area.

To be fair, I think it should be pointed out that these subsidies will be paid long after June 30 because many contracts for shipbuilding will result in work going on long after that date. So there will not be a sudden increase in unemployment. While June 30 is the date set for new applications, there are many ships now under construction that will bring those payments beyond that date.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

TRADE WITH U.S.S.R.—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, of which I sent him previous notice.

I heard this morning a report that for the first three months of the present year the trade exchanges between the United States and the U.S.S.R. had increased by 34 per cent over the last trimestrial period, which would represent a surplus of over $1 billion. I was under the impression that, following the embargo by the United States, their trade with the U.S.S.R. had been limited to a few commodities.

Would the minister inquire whether that report is well founded? If so, does the Canadian government contemplate reviewing its own present embargo policy with the U.S.S.R.?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Deschatelets for providing me with advance notice of his important question concerning Canadian policy with respect to trade with the U.S.S.R. I should like to inform the honourable senator that it has not been possible today to conduct a full analysis of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. trade figures for the first quarter of this year, although I realize that that was in a newspaper report. However, I should like to point out that it may, indeed, be too early to reach firm conclusions about the pattern of U.S.-U.S.S.R. trade based solely on the first quarter figures. This is in large measure due to the fact that those figures will include an element representing goods which were in transit when the U.S. partial embargo policy was announced.

Canadian policy with respect to trade with the U.S.S.R. is subject to periodic review, depending upon relevant circumstances. At this time it remains our policy to continue the actions already adopted and known.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

IMPORTATION OF SKILLED LABOUR BY OIL COMPANIES—FEMALE PARTICIPATION IN JOB PROGRAMS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Minister of Employment and Immigration announced yesterday that oil companies wishing to import skilled labour must co-operate with job programs which his department plans to draw up and which would achieve the policy goal of channelling women into traditional male jobs, such as welding, pipefitting and truck driving. On the other hand, the minister is reported to have said, in rejecting quotas for female participation in employment programs, that "once you begin setting quotas, you begin a system of reverse discrimination."

Can the honourable senator explain the obvious contradiction between those two statements and tell us exactly what the government policy is in this regard?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, this is another one of those cases where the questioner has destroyed his question by his preamble, because, of course, I just do not agree that there is any discrepancy between those two replies. If you set up quotas, obviously you will force companies and employers to hire that many people. If you cannot make that ratio by the quotas, then you are at variance with the law. That is pretty clear. It is also clear that the minister wants to remove any discrimination and also wants to encourage, and firmly encourage, if I may use that expression, a policy of giving to females the same access as is given to males. That is clear, too, so there is no contradiction in that.

● (1430)

One of the difficulties that has been encountered—and I do not raise it as a major problem—is that in those cases where there has been a willingness on the part of employers to hire females for employment, in some of these heavy construction projects they were unable to obtain a sufficient number of female recruits. If there are firm quotas and there is not a sufficient number of applicants, that becomes a problem. So I do not agree that there is any discrepancy in the positions.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary question. Could the minister be more specific and explain precisely what mechanism is being contemplated as an alternative to some form of quota system?

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator wishes that detail—and I appreciate that that would be useful to him—I shall take the question as notice and inquire of the minister.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to a question I put to the Minister of State for Economic Development yesterday. It was announced this morning that the Foothills group has called for tenders on a 132-mile section of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline and expects regulatory approval by the end of this month. In response to my question yesterday the minister said, in part:

> There is no point in one country going ahead with the construction if they are going to build a pipeline to the border and the other people are unable to give assurance that their section will be built . . .

In the light of that statement, can the minister tell us now whether regulatory approval of the Foothills application can be anticipated, or can he at least explain the apparent contradiction between his statement yesterday and the action of the company today in calling for tenders for the construction of a portion of the pipeline?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, here we go again! There isn't any contradiction, and I just do not appreciate that suggestion in the preamble or even in the context of the question. I think the honourable senator should look a little deeper before he cries "contradiction." There has been no authority given today. The conditions—conditions which are well known to the honourable senator—with respect fo the exchanges of assurances between the two countries will have to be met before a construction permit is issued.

What the honourable senator could have found out, with a little bit of investigation, is that this is not the first time that Foothills has taken action. The Foothills group has taken many actions in anticipation of receiving such permits. In fact, they have even ordered pipe of a special nature for part of the western leg, in anticipation of a permit to construct. They know full well that they will not be laying that pipe until the permits are approved. They also know that we are working as diligently as we can to obtain the assurances we need, so that not only I, as minister, but the Northern Pipeline Agency and, indeed, the National Energy Board will be in a position to issue the necessary permits.

With all of the intentions and hard work that are going into this, we cannot now—and Foothills knows this—give them what I think the honourable senator referred to in his question as an "anticipated date." The permits will be issued once the requirements are met.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

STATEMENT BY LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

We are told that in the message he delivered yesterday, for the end of the session in the National Assembly of Quebec, the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, the Honourable Jean-Pierre Côté, stated that Quebec has a right to self-determination and that it should also be considered as one of the two nations forming the country.

Was that message which was delivered by the Lieutenant Governor at the end of the session dictated by the Governor General in Council, whom he is representing in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no statement to make on that subject at this time. Inquiries will go forward.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Is the leader able to tell us whether the government is aware that the United States Senate has been asked just this week to provide an additional $9.7 million in funding for the Garrison dam project in the State of North Dakota, and has the Secretary of State for External Affairs made representations to the United States authorities against that project and supporting the objections of both the people of Manitoba and the Government of Manitoba?

• (1435)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Garrison diversion project, with the implications for Canada in all that projected development, is of great concern to all Canadians wherever they live. I can understand the senator's concern because of his residence in Manitoba. We are disturbed to learn that the U.S. Senate Appropriations Committee is considering additional appropriations of $9.7 million for the Garrison diversion project. This is especially disquieting to all of us, regardless of party, as this proposal is apparently being added on as an unrelated emergency bill and may, therefore, be carried without the careful consideration that this important bilateral issue deserves.

While we understand that this additional appropriation is to be used to fund work not directly affecting Canada, there is reason to worry that such new funding, being proposed for a project that has yet to be altered in any way to take Canadian and International Joint Commission concerns into account, may ultimately result in actions damaging to Canada, and especially to one of the great provinces of Canada.

I have been informed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he has instructed our ambassador in Washington to express formally Canada's deep concern at this development. He has informed me that our concern will be made known today both to the U.S. Administration and to all members of Congress.

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to an Order of the Senate made earlier this day, we are now going to suspend the Question Period and call Order No. 7 on the Orders of the Day.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider and report upon constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights and upon the future role and composition of the Canadian Senate and alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism;

That the membership of the committee be increased to thirty members and that Rule 67(1)(j) be suspended in relation to membership of the committee;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the first paragraph of the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "upon" in the second line and substituting the following therefor:—

"the matter of constitutional reform with special attention being given to the question of the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights".—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my intervention will be reasonably brief, so that the amendment can come to a vote soon.

Events have overtaken both the motion moved on May 29 by Senator Lamontagne and the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition on June 4. Since that time the first ministers met on June 9, and from that meeting we have a document entitled Priorities for a New Canadian Constitution. It is a list of proposed items for review, not in any order of priority, as some of the provinces have taken pains to point out, but, nevertheless, a list of items for review that has been agreed to as a basis for discussion between now and September 8.

We also have a work schedule. Ministers and officials will negotiate during the summer months and report back, it is hoped, with agreement on some of the items, to a first ministers conference on September 8.

It is my contention that the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition is better suited than the original motion to the priorities and to the work program which emerged from the June 9 meeting of first ministers.

The amendment of the Leader of the Opposition would give our committee a mandate to pay special attention to the division of powers and to constitutional provisions regarding individual and collective rights. The list of 12 priority items to be dealt with by the first ministers includes a charter of rights, including language rights. As Senator Tremblay pointed out the other day, it includes six specific items dealing with the distribution of powers.

• (1440)

Senator Lamontagne's original motion mentions individual and collective rights and the future role and composition of the Senate and, in the words of his motion, alternative constitutional arrangements compatible with true federalism—

In his intervention on June 12, Senator Lamontagne defined the alternative constitutional arrangements he has in mind. He would, as I understand him, institutionalize the federal-provincial conference and vest in that institution the kind of powers suggested for a federal council by the Pepin-Robarts Commission and by Mr. Ryan's beige paper, among others. I must say

I find persuasive the argument that has been advanced from this side of the chamber that before we consider the need or otherwise for such a federal council, in the words of Senator Lamontagne, "to enable provincial governments to control the exercise of federal powers in their areas of jurisdiction," we should try to settle in our own minds what kind of power should be located at which level of government, and what kind of Constitution we will be working with.

Somebody pointed out yesterday, too, that to consider the federal council first would seem to imply that there is to be little or no change in the existing division of powers. I can do no better at this point than recall, in support of Senator Flynn's amendment and his approach, the words of the Prime Minister himself at a press conference in this city on May 29. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister, in replying to a question about the kind of confederal body contemplated in Bill C-60 in a previous Parliament and by the Government of British Columbia, among others, said:

> I think the reform of the Upper House must be and should be tied to the question of regional versus national powers.

Later, the Prime Minister said:

> I say the whole question of the Upper House has to be solved at the same time as the question of division of powers. We are prepared to see the provinces come en masse and sit on Parliament Hill if we are left with very, very substantial powers like, indeed, the government in Bonn is left. But if we are going to continue to be deprived of powers so that the provinces can exercise these powers in their own right, and to boot we are to be told that the powers that are left with us can only be exercised under the watchful eye of Big Brother the provinces, we say no deal.

> I think the question of jurisdictions and the question of the Upper House should be faced together, with perhaps also the question of the Supreme Court, which will be in large part the arbiter of the exercise of that divided sovereignty.

When the Prime Minister talks about the Upper House, he is talking about the kind of confederal chamber or federal council suggested by Bill C-60 or by the Pepin-Robarts Commission or by the British Columbia government.

I hope that, whatever may be said about my own arguments, the testimony I have brought to bear from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister will prove to be irresistible to honourable senators opposite in rallying them to the support of Senator Flynn's amendment.

In summary, I think that the process agreed to on June 9 by the first ministers will be better served by giving our committee the kind of broad mandate contemplated in Senator Flynn's amendment. The committee should not work in a vacuum. Federal-provincial consultations will be going forward until July 6, and from July 7 to July 25 federal and provincial ministers and officials will be meeting for the first round of negotiations. These will be held behind closed doors but if previous federal-provincial conferences are any indication, the public will have a pretty good idea of what is going on. In any case there will be a public report to the first ministers on September 8. So given the latitude to tailor its work, I think our committee may be able to assist the process that the federal and provincial governments are now committed to for this summer and fall.

Honourable senators, that process will probably be very well advanced before the Senate as a whole has another opportunity to discuss constitutional matters. Therefore, I want to express my concern as to what the intentions of the federal government are. Earlier in this session I expressed my disagreement with the bleak picture painted in the Speech from the Throne, and by the Prime Minister in his own speech, of a country which supposedly was everywhere torn by regional ambitions and conflicts. In recent months the Prime Minister has sometimes returned to this theme, but on some occasions he has offered a more positive interpretation of what is happening in the country. I refer particularly to his statement on the night of the Quebec referendum, and to his letter to the provincial premiers inviting them to attend the June 9 meeting, as well as to his individual letter to Premier Lévesque about that meeting, emphasizing the positive spirit and the will to change that exists in all the provinces. Indeed, he said in one of those letters—I believe it was the letter to Premier Lévesque—that this provided us with an historic occasion which we ought not to miss. It is in that context that I find so inexplicable subsequent statements by the Prime Minister himself and other members of the government and the Liberal Party, which in my view serve only to create needless controversy and arouse suspicion as we embark on this new constitutional process.

Honourable senators will be aware that speculation is rife in the country, and with some basis, as to scenarios for unilateral action by Ottawa. We have had trial balloons, sent up by the chairman of the Quebec Liberal caucus, concerning a national referendum. There have been more veiled allusions by the Prime Minister himself and by other ministers about possible unilateral action, the whole effect of which seems to be to focus the attention of the provinces and others on the consequences of failure rather than on the benefits of success. If it were only a question of tactics one would be content to wait and see what results are produced, but my concern is that federal Liberals and in particular those from Quebec are so enthusiastic about the results of the referendum campaign in that province that they are eager to try it on across the country. I am not alone in that apprehension. One only has to read what has been said by some of the premiers; one has only to read what has been said by some of the respected commentators across the country including in the last few days editorials by the editor-in-chief of Le Devoir—who was the only member of the editorial staff of that paper to support the "No" position in the referendum campaign—and by the editor of La Presse. I am not alone in my apprehension that unilateral action is being considered, perhaps by way of an end-run in some kind of cross-country referendum. I would like to say, with complete sincerity and with all the conviction I can command, to those who may be tempted by that course: forget it. A referendum, putting questions about the patriation of the Constitution or an amending formula or a charter of rights, including linguistic rights, would not resolve federal-provincial differences on those matters; it would simply cement those differences.

Imagine what would happen if a referendum of that kind were to pass with a majority of the Canadian voters in favour of it, but with entire regions or entire provinces voting against it. It would leave a legacy of division and bitterness and, I believe, intensify whatever separatist feelings may be incipient in any part of the country. If the referendum were to fail and the majority of voters in Canada voted against it, but if some provinces or regions voted in favour, it would set back the cause of constitutional reform by a generation and perhaps lead to the breakup of the country.

I do not believe, and it is a personal opinion, that a national referendum in this country is even an appropriate way to ratify an agreement on constitutional changes reached by the federal and provincial governments. I think each government should be left to take whatever steps it feels necessary to develop a consensus in its own legislature and amongst the public generally, in support of any such agreement.

The kind of national referendum or unilateral action that has been talked about is an end run around the provincial governments. We have to face the fact that this country is a federation, but not because the Fathers of Confederation had some doctrinaire commitment to federalism. On the contrary, Sir John A. Macdonald, at least, always felt that a unitary state would have been better, and perhaps his successors in the office of Prime Minister have often felt the same way. But the country is a federation because it was the only practical way to bring the colonies together to form what they called the "new nationality," and it is a federation because it is the only way to make Canada work today.

When it comes to constitution-making, negotiation is the only way to proceed. To contemplate an end run by way of a referendum or some unilateral action, in my judgment, would risk the existence of the country at one toss of the dice and might tear the country apart. There is a positive attitude, as the Prime Minister in his better moments notes, with most of the governments concerned. We have to put all our faith, whether we like it or not, in that process, and in those governments, in the process that is now launched. I firmly believe that if we support Senator Flynn's amendment this chamber and our committee can materially assist that process in the weeks ahead.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, before we are asked to vote on the amendment, I should like to make one point of clarification. If we look at the British North America Act, section 92(10)(c), we can see what would happen either by the route of the amendment to the proposal, or of the main motion. Section 92(10)(c) states:

> Such Works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their Execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general Advantage of Canada or for the Advantage of Two or more of the Provinces.

I should like to emphasize ". . . declared by the Parliament of Canada." What concerns me is that in our previous discussions on the main motion and on the amendment, we dealt with government, the executive, but there seems to be insufficient emphasis put on Parliament. Some of us feel that Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate, may as well stay at home, not just in regard to the important amendments that are being proposed to our Constitution, but in other regards.

Let us for a moment contemplate how the declaratory power of section 92 would work if we followed the rules and honoured them rather than breached them. For example, the Province of British Columbia needs the revenue that it will receive from the export of natural gas. Say the federal government approached the Province of British Columbia and said it was going to tax natural gas, as the Province of British Columbia increased its exports and its price. If the federal government proposes this in the House of Commons over the unwillingness of the Province of British Columbia, and if the members agree with the federal government and pass this proposal, then under the B.N.A. Act the matter will come to the Senate for our approval. We, in the usual course of events, would probably send this bill to one of our committees such as the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is to be hoped that our committee would hear representations from witnesses representing the federal government, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Ministry of State for Economic Development, and the Province of British Columbia.

My point is that we in the Senate presumably have a mandate to have the regional concerns of Canada ventilated. If a provincial government says we should do it in some particular way, and if we are convinced it is the best way to benefit the whole of Canada, we must have the courage of our convictions, adopt the provincial proposal and defeat the federal government's proposal.

We should keep that in mind while looking at the main motion of Senator Lamontagne and the amendment that Senator Flynn has proposed. I believe that we would fall down in our duty if we did not look at these proposals coldly, determine the rules under which we play, and decide whether they are more appropriate than some of the exotic proposals that are coming before us now.

PRIVATE BILL

PYRAMID COMMUNICATIONS LIMITED—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lionel Choquette moved the second reading of Bill S-8, to revive Pyramid Communications Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, in 1978 the charter of this company, called Pyramid Communications Limited, was cancelled. The purpose of this act is to revive the company. The company's charter, which it obtained in 1925, was cancelled due to an oversight on the part of the officers of the company, and the company now prays that an act be passed reviving that cancelled charter.

The history of the company, and the facts leading to the cancellation of its charter, are, briefly, as follows. Pyramid Communications Limited, having its principal place of business in the City of Toronto, in the Province of Ontario, was incorporated under the name of Sanitary Age Limited on December 11, 1925, by letters patent issued under the Companies Act, chapter 79 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, for the purposes and objects set out in the said letters patent.

By supplementary letters patent dated February 12, 1932, the company's name was changed to Age Publications Limited. Subsequently it made another change in its name by supplementary letters patent dated August 8, 1963. On this occasion the company's name was changed to Pyramid Publications Limited. By further supplementary letters patent dated April 27, 1968, the company's name was changed to its present form, namely, Pyramid Communications Limited.

The company, for two consecutive years—and this is the oversight—failed to file in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs the annual summary required under subsection 133(1) of the Canada Corporations Act. A notice to this effect was published in the Canada Gazette on December 18, 1976, pursuant to subsection 133(10) of the said Canada Corporations Act, as that section read at that time, stating that the company would be dissolved unless, within one year of the publication of the notice, the company filed the summaries for the two years in respect of which it was in default. The said summaries were not filed, and by order published in the Canada Gazette on December 9, 1978, the company was dissolved.

The officers of the company, being unaware of the issuance of the order, have continued to carry on the business of the company as if it had not been dissolved. It will not be possible to continue to carry on the business of the company unless the Parliament of Canada enacts that:

(a) notwithstanding the publication of the said order, the company is deemed not to have been dissolved, and

(b) subject to the rights acquired by any person after publication of the said order, the company has all the rights and privileges and is liable for the obligations that it would have had had it not been dissolved.

The petitioner humbly prays that this honourable house may be pleased to pass an act for the purposes above mentioned. I would like to point out a very important fact here. The proposed bill would revive the company, and would also provide that the company be deemed not to have been dissolved. This latter provision would serve to validate, with retroactive effect, all transactions by the company during the period when it was dissolved and had no legal existence.

On motion of Senator Langlois, for Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Federal Business Development Bank has fully committed the funds it is empowered to lend under its present statutory authority. The bill before us is an interim measure, to give the bank an additional $1 billion of lending authority to enable it to continue operating until more comprehensive policy proposals, with respect to the future direction of the Federal Business Development Bank and other government small business financing programs, can be implemented on the basis of the Small Business Financing Review currently under way.

The bill, therefore, will increase the assets and ability of the bank to do business in two ways. First of all, the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, will be empowered to subscribe for a further $275 million towards the capital of the bank. If the full $275 million is in due course subscribed, the bank's capital will be $475 million instead of $200 million which it now is.

Secondly, the bank's lending ratio will be increased from 10 times its capital to 12 times its capital, with the further right for the Governor in Council to increase the 12 times ratio to 15 times. However, it will be noted that under clause 31, subclause 3, the total loans of the bank must not exceed $3.2 billion in place of the present limit of $2.2 billion. As a result of the passage of this bill, and of subsequent steps taken by the government, the bank will be empowered to make additional loans totalling $1 billion.

I have reviewed the debate in the other place on the second reading of Bill C-20. It seems to me that there was general agreement there on the thrust of the bill, which is to increase the capacity of the bank to make additional loans over and beyond the amount of its loans presently made and now outstanding. Indeed, the bill received second reading after one sitting's debate. There was, however, some interesting and constructive debate, and some criticism of the bank's operations.

As honourable senators are aware, the Federal Business Development Bank was created and is to operate as a lender of last resort. In other words, a businessman must first attempt to obtain a loan in the normal and usual manner from a chartered bank, trust company or other financial source. Only when he is unsuccessful may he apply to the bank.

The bank's mandate is to help and assist small business, but it is to operate, if at all possible, a break-even operation. Some of the bank's critics argue that the bank is failing to discharge its mandate unless it loses money, apparently on the grounds that if it does not, then it is not sufficiently generous to the applicants for loans. Personally, I cannot agree with this argument. The management of the bank must surely use common sense and refuse applicants where the bank's officials, for good reason, feel that the loan would merely result in throwing good money after bad, with no real benefit in the long-run, either to the applicant or to the bank.

The bank has been in operation for five years. Last year was the first year it suffered a loss of some $30 million. However, notwithstanding last year's loss, the bank still has some $15 million of retained earnings resulting from the previous year's operations. Last year was a difficult year, and when the bill goes to the committee, the executives of the bank will be able to explain the reasons for the unsatisfactory results of the year's operations.

While I must disclaim any intimate knowledge of the bank's business, from what I do know I am persuaded that it is an excellent institution and is fulfilling a real need and is doing a good job. I feel sure that in committee the bank's management will be able to convince honourable senators of the correctness of these observations.

Perhaps I should make a few further comments on the full scope of the bank's activities. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1980, the bank authorized over 16,000 new loans for a total of $880 million. At March 31, 1980, the bank had in excess of $2 billion of loans outstanding to more than 40,000 small businesses. Reflecting the bank's small business orientation, over 75 per cent of its loans are for $50,000 or less.

As a result of a sharp increase in equity financing in recent years, the bank is now the largest source of institutionalized new venture capital financing in Canada. In fiscal 1980, the bank authorized 86 investments for a total of more than $14 million. At March 31, 1980, the bank had investment commitments in excess of $35 million to 135 investment customers.

A number of studies of the financial problems of small business concluded that a problem of smaller entrepreneurs was related to management skills. The legislation establishing the Federal Business Development Bank gave the bank expanded responsibilities to provide management services in addition to financial services. Management services comprise three main areas: counselling, training and information services.

The bank's counselling program, Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises (CASE), uses the expertise of retired executives to assist small firms in improving their methods of doing business. Services are provided for a nominal fee. Counselling advice is provided in all areas of business management, including accounting, marketing, production and personnel. In fiscal 1980, 21,502 inquiries were received by CASE, and 14,560 assignments were completed.

Management training seminars are conducted on a wide range of topics to help small business owners and managers improve their management skills. During that past fiscal year, 1,656 one-day seminars and 77 half-day seminars were offered by the bank and over 25,000 business people took part in these seminars.

The bank also provides business information services for small business on government assistance programs for business, and refers inquiries to the appropriate government department or agency. Last year, the bank received more than 62,000 inquiries, which resulted in almost 100,000 referrals.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, the complete range of the bank's services is offered through a network of more than 100 branches and sub-branches. The bank's services are extended by regular, advertised visits to the more remote regions of the country, thereby making its wide range of financial and management services accessible to virtually all small businesses in Canada. The bank is a major part of the government's programs in support of small business. The bill before us today provides for a recapitalization of the bank to allow it to continue with its financial activities in support of small business.

[Senator Cook.]

Finally, I would like to point out to honourable senators that the bank has committed the last of the funds it was empowered to raise under existing authority. The bank will have to curtail its lending activities somewhat, if legislative relief is not forthcoming shortly. Moreover, this bill is only an interim measure sufficient to keep the bank operating for approximately two years pending the outcome of the government's review of small business financing. More comprehensive policy proposals concerning the future role of the bank will come out of this review.

Honourable senators, I ask your favourable consideration of this bill. Should it receive second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for the usual detailed consideration.

On motion of Senator Murray, for Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

BANNING OF GLASS CONTAINERS FOR CARBONATED DRINKS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION—ORDER DISCHARGED AND MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray:

That there be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications between the Minister and officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs during the year 1979, related to the banning of certain glass containers of carbonated drinks.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, I find I am forced to withdraw my motion. Before doing so, may I make a few comments? I regret that since my paralysis of September, 1970, I speak with great difficulty, and I realize that I am doing now exactly what my doctor has forbidden me to do, and that is getting into discussion and argument. But, whatever the cost, I believe my efforts have been worth it.

Today I see no need to carry this matter any further. However, I maintain that the department is still hiding facts which could be embarrassing to them and that that is why the information is so hard to obtain. There is no need for me to say that I, along with many soft drink producers, am greatly disappointed at not being able to get at the facts.

I have in my hands one letter dated May 20 last, which was written by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and my reply, dated May 30. In the department's letter a high official in the department took strong exception to remarks I made here on May 14 in which I said I was getting the run-around and in which I used the word "blackbirds." Well, nothing has really changed. I am still getting the run-around. Furthermore, in the same statement I had warned the minister that the blackbirds were "still in the nest," and all I can say now is that those blackbirds must have hatched, because now there seems to be an all-out effort to conclude the matter as quickly as possible. There is one thing I know, and that is if my party were in power I would see to it that some of those blackbirds were demoted to sparrows.

My sole motive in pursuing this matter in the first place was that I felt that both the public and the soft drink bottlers had gotten a rotten deal, and my main effort was to try to save those producers from a tremendous financial loss, amounting to several hundreds of millions of dollars, and trying to prevent them from being forced to lay off masses of people from the production lines.

Both last night and this morning I studied the answers to my questions which were forwarded to me by Senator Frith. I must say I have to admit that it is a lost cause. I regret that. It reminded me of the answer I used to receive from the CNR years ago to my many inquiries: "It is not in the best interests of the public."

In any event, I thank Senator Frith for his efforts. I realize that even he could not get the proper answers. But at least the producers now know where they stand. I regret to say that they stand exactly where they stood on August 28, 1979. They have gained nothing. Indeed, millions of their dollars are going down the drain. As for modifying the bottles, these new requirements now destroy all of their previous efforts. At this stage, the coated bottles are still only in the process of development, and nowhere in Canada has there yet been any success in that line. So there does not seem to be any relief from that source in terms of the millions of dollars that have been invested in the conventional bottles already in existence and paid for by the producers.

Honourable senators, realizing that the next move would be to call for a vote in the Senate and knowing also what the result of that would be, seeing such a huge majority of government supporters, I see no alternative to withdrawing my motion. In going so, I must say it is against my own wishes, but in a sense I have a gun pointed at my head.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators, that this motion be now withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

STATEMENT BY THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, earlier this afternoon a question was put by the Honourable Senator Asselin regarding a statement alleged to have been made by the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, the Honourable Jean-Pierre Côté.

Since the honourable senator was apparently quoting from a news dispatch when he referred to a statement reportedly made in Quebec yesterday by the Honourable Jean-Pierre Côté, Lieutenant Governor of that province, I decided, before answering his question, to take the precaution of checking on whether the statement referred to by the honourable senator was made by His Excellency in the exercise of his official functions as Lieutenant Governor or in some other circumstance not related to his official post.

I am now reliably informed that the statement made by the Honourable Jean-Pierre Côté was part and parcel of the Speech from the Throne that he read at the prorogation of the session of the Quebec National Assembly and that, consequently, he was merely reading a statement submitted to him by the provincial cabinet, as is customary in such circumstances.

It is therefore quite evident that His Excellency was not expressing his personal views but rather the views of the Government of the Province of Quebec.

I felt it important to put that information before the Senate as quickly as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on May 7 the Honourable Senator Doody raised a question concerning the financing of the indexation of pensions in the public service. The matter was raised again yesterday, June 18. It is true that public service pensions are indexed annually to reflect increases in the Consumer Price Index. The indexing feature applies to the government's pension plans for public servants, the military, RCMP personnel, members of Parliament, federal judges, and so on. Indexation benefits are currently financed out of the special contribution of 2 per cent of annual salary, evenly divided between the government and its employees, paid into the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account by and on behalf of pensioners and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. In other words, indexing benefits are financed on a partial pay-as-you-go basis.

● (1540)

The basic pension plans for government employees, the military and RCMP personnel are financed by government and employee contributions, together with accumulated interest earnings. These plans are fully funded in that enough moneys are set aside to accumulate, with interest, enough funds so as to pay for benefits earned. Employees currently pay contributions of 6.5 per cent of annual salary less Canada/Quebec Plan contributions to the basic pension plans.

The President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible for public service pension policy, is currently reviewing the indexing feature as well as other pension issues which have emerged over time. Whether there will be any proposals to change the current system will depend on the outcome of that review.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT TO PRESS BY CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, while I note that the minister provided an answer about Quebec asked earlier this day, I should like to inquire of the Leader of the Government as to when I shall get an answer to a question I put to him on May 14 last in connection with an alleged statement by the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations. It is now June 19 and I still have not received an answer. I know the United Nations fairly well. They have an excellent up-to-date press room and very good recording services. I know there is a direct government line between Ottawa and New York. It should be almost as easy to make a phone call to New York as to Quebec City.

I would like to know if there is some particular reason why the Ambassador of Canada to the United Nations is allowed to remain under this cloud of suspicion and misunderstanding, and I am wondering why it cannot be removed. This is my third time of asking, as they say in the Anglican Church.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Is it not also part of the service that after three inquiries, if there are no objections, it is considered . . .

Senator Petten: Let them speak now or forever after hold their peace.

Senator Perrault: The whip is of that great faith and understands the words so well.

Honourable senators, a reply to Senator Macquarrie's question has not as yet found its way into the file of replies that I have received from the office of the Minister of State for External Affairs. I share with Senator Macquarrie the concern that a reply has not been forthcoming to date. I can only say that our efforts in this regard will be intensified.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, June 25, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 25, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. United States officials were reported this morning as saying that Canada itself is primarily responsible for the fact that it has a deficit under the auto pact. Is the minister in a position to tell the Senate if and how Canada might in some way be responsible for its worsening deficit position under the auto pact?

● (2005)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have heard and read some of the press reports to which my honourable friend refers, and, of course, the next stage is to say that we made the decision to build larger automobiles, and because the market is not for that type of vehicle we got into this problem.

I should like to take that part of the question as notice and check with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, since both the United States and Canada are aware of the fact that some revision and renegotiation of the auto pact is imminent, it may be that some of these reports are for the purpose of setting out a bargaining position.

Senator Charbonneau: With respect to a bargaining position, some American officials were also quoted as saying that during the course of an election year in the United States, Canadians should be doubtful that the auto pact would be renegotiated to their advantage.

With that statement in mind, can the minister tell us whether or not the government is counting on considerably reducing its expected $6.5 billion trade deficit this year as a result of negotiations yet to take place between Mr. Gray and his counterpart in the United States.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, when the source of the information is "some officials," "somebody," or "they," it is difficult to respond. If the statement had been made by someone who can be identified, and who holds a responsible decision-making position within the Government of the United States, then, of course, there would be a certain level of credibility attached to it. On the other hand, when the source is some elusive "they" or "some officials," it may be information that does not have much validity. Therefore, I shall refer the question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce before making any further comment on it, but with the assurance that this government is determined to make sure that we receive all the benefits flowing from Canadian production and markets, and will emphasize all the factors considered when the auto pact was first negotiated, and when it was renegotiated from time to time.

● (2010)

Senator Charbonneau: Well, Mr. Minister, considering that all the large auto makers are American owned, and given the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce's well-known disdain for foreign investment, does the government have a contingency plan to send, perhaps, an alternative minister or ministers to Washington to discuss renegotiation of the auto pact should Mr. Gray fail to achieve a better deal for Canada?

Senator Olson: It is very easy for me to answer that question. The answer is no.

ENERGY

SUBSTITUTES FOR PETROLEUM PRODUCTS IN INDUSTRY

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I direct this question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The seven heads of government committed themselves at Venice to increase financial incentives to accelerate the substitution of oil in industry. Given that the Progressive Conservative government had announced in its budget a precise program of assistance for the conversion of Atlantic Canadian industry from oil to gas and other fuels, would the minister tell the Senate what alternative programs the government had in mind when it supported this declaration in Venice?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Canada is one of the few countries in the fortunate position of having sufficient supplies of natural gas to substitute on conversion for all the crude oil requirements that exist—that is to say, as soon as we can get the distribution system in place there is simply no question about our having sufficient supplies, both known and potential, for a long period into the future to enable us to switch directly from crude oil to natural gas.

Of course, just saying that does not make it happen overnight. We know what happened with respect to some parts of the application for the Q and M pipeline that were delayed because of environmental considerations. But that is our policy. It has been the stated policy of the government, and it continues to be. That is a highly desirable substitution because the pollution and environmental considerations are reduced very substantially vis-à-vis the use of other forms of fuel.

In addition to that, we have announced our intention, for example, to participate in a very significant increase in coal production—this was also part of the statement that came out of Venice—and to supply it on a world scale. Whether or not larger quantities of coal will be used in Canada as a substitute is a good question. I suppose there are places where the economics would say that that is the right thing to do. However, to get back to the other point, it is, I think, in Canada's interest that we do in fact significantly increase the supply of high-grade coal so that it may relieve some of the pressures on the whole world market for oil.

Again, Canada is not in a position that it needs to use that kind of fuel, particularly keeping in mind possible pollution problems in some cases, because we have adequate supplies of natural gas to undertake all of the substitution that can be done as far into the future as we can see.

• (2015)

OIL CONSERVATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to Senator Olson.

Oil consumption in Canada increased by 4.2 per cent last year. The latest figures for the United States indicate that through the end of November oil consumption there had declined.

Could the honourable minister tell us what action the government proposes to take in order to promote oil conservation and to discourage oil consumption in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I can tell you one thing we are not going to do, senator, and that is impose an excise tax. I can tell you that there are programs that are designed for conservation of all forms of energy used for heating purposes. There is the CHIP program.

I must be a little careful here, because I am not sure whether the minister has already announced some enhancement of that program. I had better check to see if he has or not.

Senator Marshall: He did in his speech today.

Senator Olson: There are a number of other measures that are designed to conserve energy.

I suppose the honourable senator could make the argument—and I would not disagree—that price in the United States has been a great disincentive to the previous levels of gasoline usage. It is nearly twice as high in some parts of the United States as it is in some parts of Canada now.

But we do not believe that that is the best method, but it is perhaps part of the overall method. Everybody agrees that this fuel will have to increase in price, but the position of our party is well known in this respect.

Senator Flynn: Before the election you felt quite confident it would not have to be.

Senator Olson: It is important to have the confidence of the people to be elected.

Q & M PIPELINE—ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Hon. Jack Marshall: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In reply to Senator Sherwood the minister referred to the Q & M pipeline and to the environmental study that has to take place before that pipeline can go ahead.

Since natural gas is a most important alternative fuel, would the minister give us a progress report on the state of the environmental study, when it is expected to be completed and when we will hear about it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall try to obtain that information. I guess if I were asked what specific, detailed reasons the National Energy Board had for being unsatisfied—not dissatisfied but unsatisfied—with the environmental work that was presented at the hearings, I really could not answer, because it is not my purpose, nor the purpose of any minister, to superimpose our judgment on, or interpretation of, the technical evidence.

I shall try to ascertain the status of the situation wherein the sponsoring company comes back to the National Energy Board to try to satisfy deficits in terms of both information and undertakings to protect the environment. I will do my best to obtain that information.

PROMOTION OF PETROLEUM SUBSTITUTES—TAXATION POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question to put to the minister in connection with the conservation of energy. He is probably aware that in Manitoba there is a plant being converted to the production of alcohol so that it may be used with gasoline to propel farm implements. The Government of Manitoba has waived its regular tax on that commodity in order to make it more attractive as an economic proposition.

Will the minister let us know whether the federal government has any intention of taking similar action so that this eminently satisfactory substitute for oil may be promoted?

• (2020)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall have to refer that question to the Minister of Finance as to whether such a request has been made to him from, I presume, the producers of this product in Manitoba. I will also ask him what his response, if any, has been to this date.

Senator Roblin: Might I ask my honourable friend to get a response to my request as well, that he reduce the tax?

Senator Olson: I guess I had better not say what I am tempted to say. Yes, I will try to get that too.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question either of the Minister of State for Economic Development or the Leader of the Government. It has reference to the development of an extraction plant for Irish moss in the western area of Prince Edward Island, an area formerly represented in the House of Commons with great distinction by my colleague, Senator Phillips. I should like either minister to indicate if this plant, which it has been announced is about to be established, will produce carrageen, which is the final product of Irish moss, the essential money-earning product, or if it will produce something just short of that. I believe that both ministers know, as I am sure my honourable friend Senator Phillips knows, as does Senator Inman, that one of the great problems in Prince Edward Island is that our people have developed the product up to two or three stages before the final development of carrageen. If either minister can tell me that in the Tignish area we have now had the promise to establish a plant, I am sure that Senator Phillips and I will rejoice profoundly, even though it happens under a Liberal government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that detailed information is not available this evening. The question will be taken as notice.

TRANSPORT

DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHEASTERN BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL FIELDS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to a news report that appeared in the Globe and Mail on, I believe, Friday last. It indicated that the British Columbia government had withdrawn completely from the development of the proposed Ridley Island coal port and will not provide the $4 million as promised.

My question is: Has the coal port been put in jeopardy by virtue of the inability of the two governments concerned to reach agreement on the jurisdiction of this facility?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the matter of the British Columbia response to a certain number of proposals which had been subject of an earlier agreement with the national government is under negotiation at the present time. However, agreement on this particular matter should in no way jeopardize the entire project.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I may be allowed to bring to the attention of the Senate a situation report on the progress of the drought in Manitoba. I have been doing this on a weekly basis, and I hope that I shall not have to do it much longer.

I can report that it is now officially stated that the drought in that province is the worst in the century, and without the additional feed supplies over what has already been provided, there is a prospect that some 200,000 head of cattle will have to be marketed. I guess it was in the light of that situation that the provincial government produced its plan the other day to help meet this emergency.

My question of the Leader of the Government, in the absence of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, is: Has the government made any decision to increase the amount of aid that is earmarked for the drought in western Canada, from the $7 million already announced?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information with respect to this very serious national situation, because the drought problems which exist in the province of Manitoba and in other regions of the west should be of concern to all Canadians. Having anticipated that there could be a question this evening, and in view of Senator Argue's absence, I shall read the information which has been made available to me:

Senator Argue, as Saskatchewan's representative in the cabinet, has assumed a leadership role in informing the government about drought conditions and developing the appropriate level of federal response. He is in the west again this week; indeed, he has been there today, going from town to town and from farm to farm consulting the people who are directly affected.

The cabinet has already discussed measures to be taken, and we will discuss the situation again. The sum of $7 million, of course, has been made available as the honourable senator mentioned. At the moment, this money covers programs in place and those that have been agreed to. As the situation persists, and there is a need for more money, the federal government stands ready to play its full role.

Our colleague is due back here tomorrow night and will, I am sure, wish to report at that time. The government, and no doubt all of Parliament, will be interested to hear his first-hand report on the drought conditions that are plaguing the west.

Criticisms have been voiced that there are no Manitobans on the committee of producers who are acting as advisers to the Emergency Drought Task Force of the Government of Canada. I have checked into this and I am informed that there are four farmers from Manitoba on the federal Emergency Drought Task Force, and presumably they are giving Manitoba effective and outstanding representation on that force.

Additionally, may I just review as briefly as possible the further aid that is contemplated by the federal government.

First is the early reactivation this spring of the federal government's Emergency Drought Task Force. This is a group of federal officials, primarily from the Department of Agriculture and DREE—

Senator Roblin: It is all on the record.

Senator Perrault: Yes. May I suggest, honourable senators, that if the representatives from Manitoba already have this information, the material which I had proposed to read could be placed in Hansard, if that would be useful.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his statement, and I accept his suggestion. I have to tell him that in the opinion of some—and I am now reading from an editorial headline which comes from a newspaper whose politics are quite unknown to me, namely, the Winnipeg Free Press—the government is "fighting the drought with PR." I am inclined to think that there is some substance to that complaint, because I am able to say to my friend that as to having the facts available to the public, or to members of this house, they have been pretty fully ventilated, certainly in western circles, in the last few days, both in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

What they are waiting for now is some indication of what response the federal government is prepared to give. As an example of what I have in mind, may I draw the attention of the Honourable Leader of the Government to the fact that some $16.6 million will be used to transport 195,000 tons of hay from Ontario westward into Manitoba, and it is pleasant to record the fact that the railways of Canada have already agreed to pay one-third of the cost of that movement, which is a very substantial sum.

The Province of Manitoba is asking the federal government whether it will pay one-third, so that the province itself may be left with one-third. May I ask my honourable friend if there has been any decision on that request?

Senator Perrault: I can report, honourable senators, that later this week the federal cabinet will have new initiatives for drought assistance before it. May I suggest that as our colleague the Honourable Senator Olson is associated with committee work in connection with the drought situation, he may wish to report any information he has on the subject.

Senator Flynn: Is he associated with a cabinet committee? If so, which one?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot satisfy my honourable friend's curiosity in that respect, because he will keep on asking other questions.

As far as the federal government's response to the emergency situation respecting drought is concerned, I think one or two things ought to be understood. Along with some of my colleagues, I have read the press reports which express dissatisfaction, saying it is not enough. It should be made clear that the $7 million is intended to cover our portion of what is needed immediately to look after the situation where livestock require supplementary feed on the pastures so that they do not have to be moved out, prematurely marketed or, worse still, the brood-cow herds sold off, because they form the foundation of the cattle industry. It was never intended to be an entire program, and we have announced that from time to time.

● (2030)

Honourable senators, the action taken by federal officials in that area, including Senator Argue, has not been limited by lack of commitment of funds. The amount of money committed to date is in excess of what can be used in such a short time, whether it is one-third or a half-share formula. There is no resistance in that respect.

We are now looking at the physical requirements which must be met. We are not holding that up because of the cost. There is much more to this matter in that if the situation is not relieved by some rainfall fairly soon then, of course, we have the prospect of supplying feed for this livestock through the winter until the spring. We hope that assistance in this respect will be announced by the federal government with provincial participation, both financially and administratively. Then producers will know now what action they ought to take to defend themselves against having to sell off their herds before winter, and what level of assistance will be provided so they can be confident that they should take action to keep these brood-cow herds rather than sell them off.

Senator Roblin: If I may react to what my honourable friend has said, and at the same time ask another question with respect to the matter, I would point out that the $7 million provided to date is for the whole of the west. I do not know how much of that will eventually wind up in Manitoba, but I suspect not all of it—in fact, considerably less than all of it.

If my honourable friend is talking about the cash flow problem with respect to bills that have to be paid, that is one thing, and it is largely irrelevant to the point I have been trying to make because if we look at what needs to be done in the future, I think the Manitoba government's analysis of the situation is a pretty accurate indication of what is required. The Manitoba government has made an analysis of the amount of feed that must be moved into that province to support the herds in terms of hay, in terms of concentrate and in terms of whatever else is available. It has made its analysis in terms of haying road allowances and railway rights-of-way; in terms of allowing cattle to pasture on crown lands and on preserves where wildlife is presently protected, to the detriment of local cattle. It has looked down the road to analyze the need for fodder over the winter and produced a plan to encourage farmers to help themselves by growing their own in a special program that was announced just the other day. It is for these measures which are already in place, and which are based on a careful analysis of the situation, that I ask consideration.

Sixteen million dollars has been mentioned as the sum required for rail movement, and that is going to be shared, I hope, in a three-way split between the parties mentioned. The farmers themselves will be paying $60 to $70 a ton for hay which is about twice what they would normally expect to pay, but there are also other very large expenditures running into tens of millions of dollars which the Province of Manitoba reasonably foresees being necessary to cover the anticipated expense.

In any case, the Province of Manitoba could not wait for a decision on these matters when the situation was moving along as fast as it was. It had to take the bull by the horns and simply say that it was going to take action regardless.

I ask my honourable friend to secure the consideration of this matter by his colleagues, so that reasonable support to the province can be given. I would suggest that it be 50 per cent of the costs, after excluding the rail movement costs in the way I have mentioned.

● (2035)

But this is a serious situation. We are looking at a shortfall in cash income in Manitoba in the order of $300 million on crops alone, and this $40 million program I have been mentioning really has nothing to do with crops. We already know that people there are going to have to rely on crop insurance and the Agricultural Stabilization Act to do what can be done for them. Although there are about 5,000 farmers, 25 per cent, I regret to say, are covered by neither of those programs, and that is a problem that will come up in the future.

What I have been talking about has to do with livestock only, and I ask my honourable friend if he will use his best efforts as a western minister to endeavour to see that this quite reasonable and intelligent program of the Government of Manitoba receives the support it deserves from federal authorities.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is no resistance whatever to participating at a much higher level as far as financial support is concerned, and I am sure that that is an action for which the federal government will receive support from all over Canada in this emergency situation.

The fact that Manitoba has made an announcement in advance of having a prior financial commitment by the federal government in no way jeopardizes the possibility of asking the federal government to participate, but there probably is some more required for the winter and so on. When we get it all together, we can then negotiate as long as is necessary to determine the shares that will be paid by one level or another.

I can also tell my honourable friend that the $7 million he mentioned is for all of western Canada. That is true. There is very little of Alberta left in a drought situation, although there is a little piece. There is now a much smaller portion of Saskatchewan still in a drought position, to the extent that help is needed for supplementary feed on pasture. In Saskatchewan, of course, the hay crop on dry land, or at least unirrigated land, is probably lost for this season regardless of how much it rains. Manitoba is the largest and the most serious area on both counts because the rains have not gone that far east to date to stimulate any grass growth in those pastures.

While the $7 million is for the whole of the prairies, the affected area is now much smaller than it was when that sum was announced.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Province of Manitoba has given $40 million, and my question is: Is any of that money going to be recovered? Are they going to charge the farmers? Are they going to give, or sell, the farmers the hay they are going to get from Ontario? Is the provincial government that is purchasing hay in Ontario going to give it outright to the farmers in Manitoba, who certainly need it? Will it be an outright gift, or are they going to recover the money spent on that hay?

Senator Olson: I cannot answer that question. I shall have to make inquiries about it. I would expect that a large part of it will be used to pay the transportation costs, or to cover the increase in price brought about by the demand for hay, even from that area in Ontario, but I really should not say that. I shall have to make inquiries as how much is offered as non-recoverable assistance, how much the farmer is expected to pay for the hay, or indeed, how much, if any, the province intends to recover—and I would be surprised if there is any.

● (2040)

Senator Guay: I have a supplementary question. We all know that hay is extremely expensive, particularly in Manitoba. It is well over $100 a tonne. I understand from a clipping I read—which is from the same paper to which Senator Roblin referred—that this hay could be sold to farmers at $60 to $70 a tonne. If that is the case, does that amount represent the freight charges or the cost of the hay that the provincial government will be handing out to those farmers who require hay at the moment?

Senator Olson: Rather than speculate on any of those questions, I will take them as notice. I shall see if I can find out from the Government of Manitoba the breakdown of costs.

Senator Roblin: I know that no one asked me to answer either of those questions, but I can tell the chamber that, to the best of my knowledge, farmers are being asked to pay $60 to $70 a tonne for the hay. This represents the cost of buying it in Ontario. The freight charge is what is provided by public funds.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question relating to the Garrison diversion project. This is a matter of some interest these days in view of activities going on in the United States Congress.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, visited Washington, D.C., in the past few days. He is reported as having said that a deal on Garrison is possible. Indeed, the direct quotation is that, "a little negotiating" is required in respect of this matter.

Could the leader enlighten us on what aspects of the negotiations the minister referred to so that we may do our best to follow up on all levels with respect to the statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, because the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy has demonstrated concern for the welfare of Manitoba, any negotiations which he may have made reference to will be in the best interest of Manitoba and in the best interest of Canada.

I will take the question as notice because I do not have a statement responding to it this evening.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate my friend's reply. It is rather important that we should know just where we stand on this matter. As far as my province is concerned, this is regarded as a high priority matter.

THE ECONOMY

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question respecting small business development bonds. We had a exchange on this matter the other day. I now see that the government produced a communiqué, dated June 13, in which it gives some of the rules and regulations under which small business development bonds will be made available.

My question has to do with the terms and conditions of the bonds. As I read the document that has been given to us, the money produced by a development bond of this kind has to be dedicated to new capital investment or for research and development expenditures. I know that this limitation will come as a great disappointment to many small businessmen, because they thought that the aim of the exercise was to help them with interest rates. If they cannot be helped with respect to working capital, which is the main requirement of a small business, I think the government will find that the exercise is not satisfactory as far as small businessmen are concerned.

Will the minister give us an assurance that he will endeavour to have the terms of this policy broadened so that working capital requirements may be included in the purposes for which these bonds may be raised?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the only assurance I can give my friend is that I will make those representations to the Minister of Finance. I am not sure I know the reasons behind limiting the purposes, as interpreted by my friend. I am not arguing with his interpretation; I am simply saying that I have been around long enough to know that sometimes one has to look at both sides for an interpretation. I am sure he would not want me to give the kind of assurance he asked for until I find out from the Minister of Finance what exactly is the case. If I were to respond before doing that, it would put me in a position of disagreeing with him.

Senator Roblin: I can tell the minister that the wording is quite clear. If he cares to take a look at the communiqué, he will see that. Certainly small business organizations feel that this is a big letdown and they are very disappointed. I do hope that we can do a little better for them than the communiqué indicates.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

PROGRESS OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he could give us an up-to-the-minute report on the progress being made in the other place respecting the national anthem. In particular, would the leader care to prognosticate on the prospects of giving royal assent to that proposed legislation before the end of this month?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been a discussion in the other place with respect to this matter. This measure is of interest to all Canadians. I have not an up-to-date report on the progress of that measure in the other place. I understand that efforts are being made to have it available for consideration in the Senate before the week is out.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PORT HAWKESBURY AND GLACE BAY—REPORTED SHUTDOWN OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I had not planned on asking a question this evening, but because questions are being asked on subjects about which we can read in the newspapers and hear on the radio, and know what is happening in the other place, I thought I should return to my question regarding the possibility of cutbacks in the production of heavy water at the Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay plants in Nova Scotia.

If the minister does not have the information with him, he can take the question as notice and bring the information tomorrow, if he is available.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will take the question as notice. However, I can't undertake to bring information before the Senate tomorrow. I am not sure what the honourable senator's inference is. Is that information already contained in Hansard of the House of Commons, and, if it is, is he telling me that I can find it there?

Senator Muir: No. I hesitate to answer questions in this house. I wish I were answering them; I might do as good a job as the honourable gentleman who just spoke. No, I was referring to the National Anthem, and I am sure everyone knows where that stands at the moment.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am very pleased to report that as a result of diligent research done by many people, we have replies to questions this evening.

Senator Grosart asked how the government's decision to increase science spending by $190 million for 1980-81 in an effort to train more researchers and increase technological innovation in industry was consistent with the commitment made in the Throne Speech to increase Canada's overall expenditures on research and development to 1.5 per cent of the value of the gross national product.

The fact is that the commitment is to raise the level of national expenditures on research and development to 1.5 per cent of gross national product by the mid-1980s. It is assumed that the federal government's share of the total will decline to 33 per cent from the current 40 per cent and that there will be offsetting increases in the shares of other performers, and more especially of industry.

Given these assumptions, the amount of $190 million is the amount by which the federal government will have to raise its expenditures on research and development in 1980-81 above the level reached in 1979-80 in order to keep federal government expenditures on line with the mid-1980 target date. Total federal research and development expenditures in 1979-80 are estimated at $1,087 million. To remain on line, federal government expenditures will, of course, have to increase in each subsequent year above the level reached in the previous one.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE OIL EXPLORATION—NEGOTIATIONS WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On June 5, Senator Doody asked the government to comment on a statement made by a representative of the Government of Newfoundland to the effect that Newfoundland was willing to put a moratorium of up to 10 years on offshore oil development. He noted further that if talks could be arranged to find a peaceful political settlement, it would be preferable to another long delay in development.

Senator Doody inquired as to steps which the two governments might be taking to break the apparent impasse between the federal government and the Newfoundland government on the offshore resource jurisdiction question.

● (2050)

I am advised that discussions have taken place between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Mr. Lalonde, and the Minister of Mines and Energy for the Province of Newfoundland, the Honourable Mr. Barry, and that they touched upon, among other things, the offshore mineral rights situation. I understand that Mr. Lalonde indicated that the federal government would like to get on with the reference to the Supreme Court, to which Newfoundland agreed in April 1976.

To date, no definite advice has been received from the Government of Newfoundland on this matter.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—FISHING VESSEL SUBSIDY PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 5, 1980, Senator Phillips asked a question in relation to the Fishing Vessel Subsidy Program in the Atlantic provinces. Senator Phillips went on to say:

> The present program provides that if construction of a boat begins before approval of the subsidy, no subsidy will be provided. Can the leader assure us that the construction of inshore boats can begin and the subsidy will be retroactive?

In response, the Fishing Vessel Assistance Regulations made under the Fisheries Development Act require that all applications for fishing vessel construction subsidies be approved by the minister before construction of the vessel to be subsidized begins. Such a requirement exists in order that funds for this program are adequately controlled and distributed fairly. Vessel design, construction methods, numbers of vessels constructed and, above all, vessel cost can all be monitored and kept at reasonable levels by means of the approval process.

Retroactive subsidies such as Senator Phillips proposes have already been attempted, with disastrous results. Coherent criteria for granting subsidies in this fashion cannot be devised, and the effectiveness of funds expended is reduced.

For these reasons, the requirements of the regulations in respect of this matter will be strictly followed.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 10 last Senator Muir asked whether the government was satisfied that all of the rights of shareholders of companies under the Canada Business Corporations Act are preserved and continued under the Nova Scotia Companies Act when approval is given by the Director of the Corporations Branch for the transfer of the jurisdiction over such companies from the federal government to the Province of Nova Scotia?

In May of 1980 the Government of Nova Scotia amended its Companies Act so that it almost parallels the Canada Business Corporations Act in the areas involving the rights of shareholders. These amendments satisfied the Director of the Corporations Branch, who had previously refused his approval for corporations to continue under the Nova Scotia jurisdiction, and it is felt that there is no reason to disagree with his decision.

Senator Muir then asked:

In view of the recent articles appearing in the Toronto Star and the Wall Street Journal regarding United Canso Oil and Gas, a Canadian company, will the minister satisfy himself that removing directorship requirements as to residency, which I understand some provinces may permit, will not adversely affect the shareholders of this Canadian resource company?

The Canada Business Corporations Act places a restriction on the choice shareholders have in electing directors in that it requires a majority of the elected directors to be resident Canadians.

It would appear that a transfer of a corporation such as United Canso Oil and Gas from the Canada Business Corporations Act to a jurisdiction that does not have the residency requirement for directors removes the restriction placed upon the normal rights of the shareholders, and therefore does not adversely affect them.

LABOUR

RESTRICTIVE PROVINCIAL EMPLOYMENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 11, 1980, Senator Haidasz asked for the federal government's reaction to the alleged restrictive employment legislation by the Governments of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Although the provinces involved may well view such legislation as essential to securing employment opportunities for provincial residents first, the federal government views such legislative developments with concern, considering the larger negative impact it could have on the employment aspirations of other out-of-province Canadians.

In the course of periodic discussions which take place between the federal and provincial governments, such matters will be discussed, and we hope legislative accommodation can be reached which will allow all Canadians unrestricted access to employment in Canada, without prejudice to the exercise of affirmative action on behalf of special disadvantaged groups.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I am very interested in the government leader's reply to Senator Haidasz's question. By way of a supplementary question, I asked him whether or not there were other provinces than Newfoundland and Nova Scotia involved.

I fully agree with him that it is not a good practice. I do believe there are other provinces with such legislation. Would the Leader of the Government advise us as to what the situation is?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward immediately in an attempt to obtain the names of the other provinces with such legislation.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISABILITY PENSIONS IN YEARS 1970 TO 1979

Question No. 8—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

[Senator Perrault.]

1. How many (a) World War I veterans and (b) World War II veterans were receiving disability pensions for the years 1970 to 1979 inclusive?

2. How many Canadian veterans were registered in Department of Veterans Affairs files for the years 1970 to 1979 inclusive?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

TRANSPORT

THE "IRVING WHALE"

Question No. 9—By Hon. Heath Macquarrie:

1. What are the dates of underwater examinations of the hull of the Irving Whale?

2. What were the results of such examinations?

3. Are any plans under way or under consideration for removing this craft from the Gulf of the St. Lawrence?

4. What representations have been received requesting such removal?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

1. Seven underwater examinations have been conducted on the hull of the Irving Whale. These examinations were conducted in September 1970 when the vessel sank, in September 1971, again in October 1973, May 1974, July 1974, September 1976 and the last examination June 1977.

2. These examinations revealed that the barge is structurally sound and in good condition.

3. No plans are under way or under consideration for removing this barge since salvage attempts would likely create the very problem we are trying to avoid.

4. Following upon a full briefing given to the Premier of P.E.I., subsequent to the last visual examination, no representations have been received requesting such removal.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether the program for the remainder of this week and next week remains the same as that outlined by him last week? I understood we would be sitting at 11 o'clock on Friday morning, probably completing our work at around 1 p.m., and not sitting at all next week. Does that still hold?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad the Leader of the Opposition has asked this question, because I had intended at some point this evening to advise the house that the plan for the business of the Senate for the next two weeks is as previously announced; namely, a sitting this evening, a sitting tomorrow at 2 o'clock, and a sitting Friday morning at 11 o'clock, with no sitting of the Senate next week.

There is, however, I regret to say, one important exception to the continuation of the plan as earlier announced, that being that we are going to have to ask honourable senators to sit this Friday afternoon. The reason is that we will have some business coming to us probably tomorrow afternoon, about which there is some urgency. It is a bill that extends fisheries loans, and it has a date limit of June 30. I am sorry to have to ask honourable senators to stay on Friday afternoon for royal assent to at least that bill, and royal assent is now planned for about 4.45 p.m. on Friday.

The bill I am referring to is still in the other place, and we do not anticipate having it before us until tomorrow afternoon. So, there is that item of business of some urgency that requires us to ask honourable senators to make themselves available for a sitting on Friday morning and Friday afternoon.

There is also the matter raised by Senator Haidasz, the possibility that we will want to have royal assent to the bill making our national anthem and its words official. I apologize for having to make this request, particularly in the context of this week, when reservations will be very difficult for honourable senators travelling to the east and the west. I realize that this puts senators who have made their reservations based on my earlier prognostication that we would meet only on Friday morning in a very difficult position, and I apologize for it.

Certainly, we shall try to make some kind of special arrangements for travel to the west and the east. Of course, we cannot undertake anything at this stage, but I am glad to say that the government leader in the other place has indicated that he will make inquiries about some special arrangements, because I can well imagine how difficult it will be at this late stage to change reservations on the July 1 weekend.

So, in summary, I apologize for having to ask honourable senators to sit on Friday afternoon. If honourable senators have their calendars before them, I shall run through the program once more. We will meet tomorrow at 2 o'clock, on Friday at 11 o'clock and again at 2 o'clock, or following an adjournment during pleasure, depending on the amount of business we have to deal with, following which we shall have royal assent.

Unless there is a dramatic change in the volume of business that we can expect—and there is no indication of that at this time—we shall not meet next week. Following royal assent on Friday afternoon, and assuming our present plan holds, we shall adjourn until 8 o'clock on the evening of Tuesday, July 8.

If there are questions on this schedule, which I know is unusual and, as I say, perhaps inconvenient, I shall be glad to accept them now and try to answer them.

PRIVATE BILL

PYRAMID COMMUNICATIONS LIMITED—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 19 the debate on the motion of Senator Choquette for second reading of Bill S-8, to revive Pyramid Communications Limited.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the sponsor of this bill, Honourable Senator Choquette, as reported at page 514 of Debates of the Senate, June 19, 1980, explained the reasons for it in his usual lucid way. It will be remembered that the measure concerns a company that was incorporated under another name in 1925, that inadvertently failed to file the material necessary to keep its charter alive in 1978, and that now requires this legislation in order to be revived in such way as to cover the period from 1978 to 1980 and thereafter.

As to the general reasons, I refer honourable senators to the speech of Senator Choquette under the reference I have already indicated. I can say that there have not been many such bills before the Senate, but there have been some. A check has indicated that the most recent was a bill to revive J.H. Poitras & Son Ltd., which is now chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1978-79, assented to on December 22, 1978.

Honourable senators, the usual procedure in respect of such bills is to refer them to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and certainly the merits of this bill can be studied by that committee. If the sponsor wishes to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study, I would be happy to support such a motion.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Choquette moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 19, the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for second reading of Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: I am happy to take part in the debate on Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act. My colleague, Senator Cook, has already spoken of the special features and the purpose of this bill. He has also spoken in some detail of the activities of the bank. I therefore intend, in what time has been allotted me, to dwell on the role of the bank in expanding the term lending market for small and medium Canadian businesses, and add to the comments of my honourable colleague with regard to its activities in the field of management counselling.

During the last Parliament, the Progressive Conservative government introduced Bill C-4 which would have allowed the Federal Business Development Bank to lend up to 12 times, and, by order in council, 15 times its own capital. According to the act now in force, total loans cannot exceed an amount equal to ten times the capital of the bank. That capital being $200 million, its loans cannot therefore exceed $2 billion.

Bill C-20 would authorize the government to lend up to 12 times the authorized capital of the bank, up to the present amount to $475 million. The total amount of loans granted by the bank cannot exceed $3.2 million. Its lending powers, however, could be increased by order in council to 15 times the capital of the bank.

There is a difference between the two bills. Bill C-20 requests an increase in lending capital of $275 million. The discussions held in the Senate Committee on National Finance have helped clarify the need for such an increase.

I want to say at the outset that I endorse Bill C-20 generally and that I will propose that it be passed. However, we must satisfy ourselves and the public that such an increase is legitimate. The Conservative government was very much concerned with the financial problems of the federal government and it tried to lower the level of government borrowings. This attitude is unchanged today, and we will continue to be on the watch as regards government expenditures.

The Federal Business Development Bank is certainly the most important service that is made available to Canadian small businesses by the federal government. Undoubtedly, such an organization needs government help to survive since it is a lender of last resort. By taking risks normally rejected by other banks, the FBDB is facing a difficult challenge if it is to make profits in the end. It has an important role to play in all parts of the country in offering management services such as counselling, training and information. Its courses, seminars, conferences and other meetings are most favourably received and contribute to develop the management capabilities of small businessmen and their employees.

According to statistics, the FBDB helps more than 2,000 new businesses to start each year, thus maintaining 36,000 jobs. By so doing it promotes the expansion of the Canadian private sector, which is the leading sector of our economy.

I believe we can rejoice in the past performance of the FBDB. Since its inception in 1974, it has helped small businesses meet their needs by giving them loans they could not obtain elsewhere at reasonable rates.

However, because of the accelerating activity in the business world, applications for loans are coming in at a level exceeding all projections. Within a few months, the bank will no longer be able to meet the demand because it will have reached the limit allowed under by the act.

Bill C-20 would raise the borrowing power of the bank from 10 to 12 times its capital. Without this increase, the bank can only lend an amount equal to that of the repayment of the loans granted. This means that it could approve only one third of the loans now granted, depriving more than 1,000 Canadian businesses of financing.

Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about small businesses and then explain the support given to them by the FBDB.

Small businesses are a vital sector of our economy. There are now about 900,000 small businesses across Canada, which means that they represent about 90 per cent of the total number of businesses in the country. Their number increases by more than 20,000 a year in nearly every sector. Small businesses provide employment for more than 2.5 million Canadians, or 42 per cent of the total work force, account for approximately 25 per cent of total business sales, and represent about 15 per cent of the gross national product. It is also important to note that most small businesses are Canadian-owned.

In Canada, new businesses are usually relatively small. While the owners of new businesses are dynamic and creative, their lack of experience and capital may hinder their success.

The Federal Business Development Bank, which replaced the Industrial Development Bank, was established in 1974 to meet the needs of new businesses and help to finance them.

In the early fifties, the bank had only a few offices. It now has over 100 branches located in all provinces and territories of Canada.

The demand for the services of the bank is greater in small towns and rural areas than in major centres where the traditional sources of such services are usually well represented. The bank has fulfilled the needs of these communities mainly by decentralizing its operations. Over 60 per cent of its branches are now located outside major urban centres. The bank can extend its services from these branches. Each year, its representatives make regular visits to more than 800 small communities to give advice to small businesses. Last year, there were over 8,500 such visits.

Honourable senators, the services now offered by the Federal Business Development Bank come under two separate but complementary headings: financial services and management counselling services.

In the beginning, the bank was established to provide term lender services, especially to small manufacturers. While the bank has extended its operations throughout the years to include all types of small and medium-sized businesses as well as risk capital investments, the major objective of the bank is to provide financial assistance to those businesses which cannot find elsewhere the financing they need on reasonable terms.

However, many small businesses do not need only financial support. After many years of experience in its branches and because of its unequalled record of success with small businesses, the bank inaugurated in the early seventies its management counselling services which include counselling, management training and information.

In order to understand the unique role played by the bank, we must examine the nature of small businesses in Canada and recognize their contribution to the decentralization of economic activity in small communities and rural areas.

● (2110)

Small businesses often are characterized by a desire to succeed, high levels of technical innovation and great flexibility.

They are uniformly dispersed throughout Canada. Moreover, every type of business is represented.

Small businesses are rather labour intensive. They produce more jobs per dollar invested and require less capital and resources than large corporations. Surely most senators would agree that nationally, the confidence, determination and optimism of small businessmen are the moral and social backbone of many communities throughout the country.

However, honourable senators, the management of a small business does not go without problems. The personal qualities required to establish a business sometimes differ from those needed to manage it efficiently. For instance, many key functions are filled by one or two owners, for which functions and responsibilities they are often inexperienced and less interested. Their small sales volumes seldom allows for advertising. They have difficulty in hiring skilled labour or obtaining raw materials. The access to credit, upon which small businesses are more dependent than larger ones, is a constant problem, especially during periods of tight credit. I know through experience and discussions with other owners of small businesses that the availability of credit is often essential to the survival of a small business.

The previous amendments to the Bank Act, including the changes proposed by Bill C-6, and also the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act, that will soon provide for government guarantees on loans of more than $100,000 by chartered banks and other lending institutions, encouraged conventional lenders to be active on the small businesses loans market. This shows the government closely co-operates with financial institutions in the search for initiatives to help small businesses.

As I said, credit to that aggressive segment of business has experienced a fantastic increase. The FBDB contributed to the expansion of the loans market, because year after year it registered significant increases in its loan activities. Such an increase has made conventional lenders more aware of the needs of small businesses.

The FBDB also innovated in offering its own financing plans. For instance, over these last few years, the bank made it known to private lenders it is willing to offer joint financing of projects that private lenders will not underwrite alone for one reason or another. I approve the steps taken by the bank to promote the term credit market for all businesses in Canada.

Despite the progress accomplished, however, many small businesses having specific needs cannot obtain credit through the traditional methods, especially in remote areas. Small businesses often are high risk borrowers by reason of their small sales volume, inadequate sureties or lack of previous records. This is where the unique position and experience of the FBDB come into play.

Often the owner of a business asks the FBDB to make a speculative investment in a project for which a basic loan cannot meet his needs. Over the last years, the FBDB has become the main source of risk capital for small businesses.

However, the FBDB has realized that in order to make a maximum use of their financing facilities, their customers would need counselling, not only in the management of their money, but also in all other aspects of their activities.

The counselling services offered by the FBDB and known as CASE are not a substitute for chartered accountants or lawyers; rather, they exercise a complementary function by supplying services that small businesses cannot afford to buy or are simply non-existent in remote communities. In fact, the counselling services create employment for those professional people by encouraging small businessmen to keep more accurate records and financial statements. The CASE program puts the experience of some 2,000 retired business people at the disposal of customers throughout the country. Last year, more than 14,000 consultations have been concluded in all kinds of small businesses. Consultant services are offered in such fields as accounting, marketing, personnel management and production. I am sure that all honourable senators will appreciate the benefits of that program which makes use of precious human resources; that is, the talents and the experience of those retired business people.

The financial and management counselling services of the FBDB have been designed to meet the needs of small businesses. The term "small" is used in its narrowest meaning. For instance, approximately 75 per cent of the approved loan applications were for amounts of less than $50,000; some 50 per cent of their issued loans are under $25,000. The average loan amounts to about $52,000.

The CASE program has been designed for businesses having fewer than 75 employees. All the activities of the program focus on small businesses.

Through this combination of financial, training, counselling and information services, the bank plays a major role in the Canadian business world. I consider it as a resource centre for small enterprise.

Honourable senators, we should emphasize that the position of the bank in that respect is recognized outside Canada. The bank has an excellent reputation amongst the development banks of the world. The FBDB was one of the first established development banks; if my memory serves me well, it was the third one to be created. Along the years, it helped other countries to create their own development banks, several of which are operating on the model of the Federal Business Development Bank.

Each year the FBDB invites 15 to 20 trainees from those banks in developing countries who are coming to study its operational systems. The expenses incurred by these visitors are paid for by the Canadian International Development Agency and, with the financing of CIDA, the FBDB is called upon to consider four or five applications per year filed by development institutions in under-developed countries. Furthermore, the bank is holding and participating in seminars in Third World countries.

The management training and counselling programs of the bank are of particular interest to many development banks, and some of them use, with the authorization of the FBDB, some training tools developed by the bank.

The FBDB is a member of the International Small Business Council which has membership in more than 30 countries. Last year, in co-operation with Laval University in Quebec, the bank hosted the 24th Annual Conference of that organization, the first to be held outside the United States.

Each year, the staff of the bank take part in international conferences dealing with small business financing by development banks. This month, the bank will host a seminar in Montreal. The problems experienced by development banks will be raised. Over 20 bankers from South American development banks as well as observers from Asia and Africa will attend that seminar.

It seems to me that the very sound activities of the FBDB at the international level can only enhance the prestige of Canada abroad.

I would like to add that every year the FDB is in contact with over 200,000 individuals managing a business or considering doing so. At the end of the 1980 financial year the FBDB had dealt with almost 40,000 customers for loans and risk capital and had made commitments practically reaching its regulatory financing ceiling of $2.2 billion.

If the bill presented to the house and aimed at raising the financing ceiling of the FBDB is not passed, it would automatically mean decreased loan activities for the bank. Several small businesses would suffer the consequences.

[Senator Charbonneau.]

Small businesses are now facing difficult times and we should certainly not consider curtailing the activities of the FBDB, one of their most precious allies. Therefore I strongly advise honourable senators to adopt this bill as soon as possible.

As this bill is only a temporary measure, pending the conclusion of the study which the government is currently carrying out into the funding of small businesses and which should be completed within a year, I suggest that it is important for this house to take part in this study by insisting, for instance, on the need to support viable corporations which have the capacity to increase their exports and compete with private corporations in other countries, where they are provided by their respective governments with the financial assistance they need to secure important contracts abroad.

In my opinion, it is clear that the government must address the issue of profitable enterprises in Canada. It seems natural for a government corporation to assume that a profitable enterprise is perfectly capable of making the investments necessary to secure abroad any contract which it is being offered. But it may occur that the extent of the required expansion may overburden the liquidities of the enterprise, or even place the enterprise in a vulnerable position and that, taking into account the current economic circumstances, its directors may decide to play it safe and avoid making investments and creating the jobs which are so badly needed.

Under ordinary circumstances, it is better for the government not to interfere with the private sector. In view of our delicate position of dependency with respect to foreign technology, however, we might be well advised to reconsider our position with respect to Canadian corporations involved with state of the art technology.

In Ontario, CAE Industries' application was recently turned down on the ground that the company was able to raise at reasonable rates the capital it needed to carry out the necessary expansion required to land a contract from the Americans for light vehicular transmission. The government offered guarantees against any loan, but the company felt that the amount necessary to allow expansion was too high for its investment program at this point of its development and that it could jeopardize the health of the whole business. The Americans had to award the contract at home, thus denying Canada the new jobs, while keeping a Canadian company from gaining precious experience in a field of high technology.

In addition, we could seize the opportunity the revision of the Federal Business Development Bank Act provides to ask the government whether it cares enough to create the climate which will help businesses remain profitable and grow. It might be useful to review the matter of the Federal Business Development Bank in an international context where other countries give their own businesses every chance they need to secure foreign contracts by making funds available at very competitive interest rates. We know that is done to aid defence industries, but could we not consider the matter in the civil industrial area?

Finally all those elements will be studied during the next month and since the role of the Federal Business Development Bank will then be revised in depth, I therefore suggest, honourable senators, that we get Bill C-20 passed immediately without referring it to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, I should like to take the opportunity to thank Senator Charbonneau for his excellent contribution to the debate on second reading of the bill. Having said that, I now move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

LIVESTOCK FEED ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Harry Hays moved the second reading of Bill C-15, to amend the Livestock Feed Assistance Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-15 is a housekeeping bill, and relates to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

The Canadian Livestock Feed Board has been in operation since 1966. There were acts before then that looked after many of the things that the feed board does today, but now all is encompassed by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

The real purpose of this board is to pay subsidies on feed grain from western Canada to Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and British Columbia. I do not have the exact figures, but over the years we have spent as much as $20 million or $25 million per year in moving feed to the maritimes, Newfoundland, Ontario and Quebec. Latterly, British Columbia has been included, and much assistance has been given by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board in respect of moving feed grain into these areas.

Recently the Northwest Territories and the Yukon have shown some interest in agriculture. About 60,000 acres have been set aside in the Yukon for agricultural purposes, of which about 4,000 acres is now being actively used in that connection. In the Northwest Territories, although the area is smaller, there are some 600 acres of land being used for agriculture, mostly for producing milk or eggs for the people there. The statute is now being amended to include the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

The amount involved is some $35,000 or $40,000, while the total amount of money now being administered by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board is in the neighbourhood of $16 million. There has been some slackening off of subsidies as a result of these areas becoming more productive in so far as agriculture is concerned, and this is the whole essence of the bill.

I would like to see this bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, because the annual report of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board has now been published, and I think many members of the committee would like to look in more detail at the purpose and function of the board.

I commend this bill to honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Sherwood, debate adjourned.

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE—REPORT REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 18, the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the adoption of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, in amendment, that the report be not now adopted, but that it be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

By way of explanation, honourable senators will remember that the wording of the report, which recommended certain trips to be taken by this joint committee, was much broader than even its proposer, the Honourable Senator Godfrey, thought it ought to be. I can say that in the other place the wording of the report has been considered and found to be broader than was really intended by the members of the joint committee. The committee, I understand, is going to meet tomorrow and will reconsider the question.

It is for that reason that I now move, seconded by Senator Lamontagne, with the agreement of Senator Godfrey, that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRIVACY BILL, 1980

FIRST READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition) presented Bill S-9, to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to government files containing personal information relating to themselves.

Bill read first time.

Senator Flynn moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, July 9.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Report of Telesat Canada for the year ended December 31, 1979, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditors, pursuant to section 37 of the Telesat Canada Act, Chapter T-4, R.S.C. 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, June 27, 1980, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think I should at this point ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether there are any changes with regard to tomorrow's order of business. Is it still the case that we will have to sit tomorrow afternoon, and, if so, why?

● (1410)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, based on present information it is still the case that the house will be asked to sit tomorrow afternoon. We hope to receive Bill C-28 sometime this afternoon and have it explained on second reading by its sponsor. The second reading debate could be continued tomorrow morning and, hopefully, completed. Then, if the Senate agrees, the bill could receive third reading and be given royal assent tomorrow.

The reason for this proposal is that, as will be recalled, the bill has a June 30 deadline. Then the obvious question is: Why can't we finish our business tomorrow morning? Well, I have no assurance that we will receive the national anthem bill before tomorrow afternoon and we are hoping, with the cooperation of all honourable senators, to be able to deal with all stages of that bill so that it too can be given royal assent tomorrow. If by any chance we do not receive that bill, we should be in a position to make arrangements for royal assent for the fisheries bill before 4.45 in the afternoon. We are therefore asking honourable senators to remain available to carry out the program I announced last night.

Senator Flynn: Is the deputy leader saying that royal assent to those two bills could not take place at, let us say, half-past twelve tomorrow, because of the national anthem bill, which would not reach us before 1 o'clock? Is that the reason why it can't be sent to us before?

Senator Frith: I am sorry, I am unable to say why it can't be sent to us before, except that I have not as yet got any guarantee that we will have it by then. It is conceivable, as I mentioned, that some time later today, or even tomorrow morning, I will be advised that we will get that bill earlier. If that happens, then I will do everything I can to meet the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, which is one that would meet with general approval on both sides of the house, I am sure.

Senator Choquette: I presume that O Canada will be sung as usual on July 1st whether it has received royal assent or not?

Senator Flynn: Assuming that the bill were to reach us in time for royal assent, let us say around 12 o'clock or 12.30 tomorrow, is the ceremony which was envisaged for the purpose of underlining the approval of the national anthem going to take place, or is the intention now that it should take place only on July 1?

Senator Frith: I don't know.

Senator Flynn: You don't know?

Senator Frith: I don't know at this point, but I believe the answer is no.

Senator Flynn: Apparently you are the only one who doesn't know.

Senator Frith: I doubt that, but it is always possible.

• (1415)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been a tentative program established for the inauguration of O Canada on Canada Day, but I want to make it clear that the ceremony will proceed only if possible and feasible. That, of course, depends upon the approval of the particular measures by Parliament. The tentative program was originally established for some event which will occur shortly after noon tomorrow, but certain events occurring in the other place have delayed passage of the bills.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

CONVERSION OF U.S. ELECTRICITY GENERATING STATIONS—POTENTIAL INCREASE IN AIR POLLUTION

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday the United States Congress passed a bill requiring the conversion of 80 northern United States generating stations from oil to coal, potentially increasing acid rainfall by as much as 16 per cent. In view of the fact that the Minister of the Environment visited Washington before the bill was considered, and that he said this week that good neighbours don't dump their garbage in each other's back yard, would the leader tell us if Canada has been assured that these plants will use the latest in anti-pollution technology to reduce or eliminate the potentially hazardous effects of acid rain falling on Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question is a good one. I have, however, only read newspaper accounts, as has the honourable senator, and the question therefore must be taken as notice.

Senator Sherwood: I have a supplementary. If the private companies which operate these plants have not yet indicated their intention to employ sophisticated technology for the control of emissions, has Canada either asked the United States government to legislate strict environmental standards respecting these plants, or received any assurance that the United States government will be subsidizing the cost of installing such technology in the 80 plants in question?

Senator Perrault: A reply will be forthcoming.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: In view of the increasing urgency of environmental and energy problems, is the Leader of the Government now prepared to support the creation of a standing Senate committee on natural resources and the environment? The leader will recall that in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I outlined the possible terms of reference of such a committee. I feel it is becoming increasingly important to establish a standing Senate committee to which questions such as this could be directed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, certainly consideration will be given to that proposal.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—FISHING VESSEL SUBSIDY PROGRAM

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to thank him for his delayed answer last evening, and ask for his co-operation in replying to this question. We on this side always appreciate his helpful co-operation.

My question relates to the fishing vessel subsidy program. Would the Leader of the Government please advise us what funds will be available in the present fiscal year, what funds have already been committed to the program and when the funds will become available? I should like to have this information before the debate on Bill C-28, if possible.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will give priority to that request for information. My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, will be contacted as soon as possible.

NEWFOUNDLAND

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Jack Marshall: My question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and it has to do with the position paper by the Premier of Newfoundland which is now, I understand, in the hands of the Prime Minister. My question also relates to the various priorities which the Province of Newfoundland must have in order to improve its economy. Since the Minister of State for Economic Development is the overall supervisor of economic development, I am sure he is in on the talks.

• (1420)

I am wondering what is the state of progress with regard to those priorities. One is a top priority, namely, the removal of barriers to the transmission of electric power to outside markets other than Quebec, which incidentally the Prime Minister of Canada agrees to. Also needed are further improvements to highways, particularly the Trans-Canada Highway, which is quickly deteriorating; the upgrading of the Newfoundland Railway, which was promised with money committed by the previous government; challenges to the ownership of the continental shelf by the Province of Newfoundland; continued efforts in the development of the Lower Churchill, which would provide an alternate source of energy; and other matters which are so important to the economy of Newfoundland.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, in order to supply the detail on each of the specific items mentioned by the honourable senator, I shall obviously have to take the question as notice. I cannot give an undertaking to respond quickly because I do not know the stage of consideration of those matters by the Prime Minister. However, an inquiry will go forward.

I should like to correct one slight impression that might have been left from the honourable senator's preamble. I am not the supervisor of economic policy—"co-ordinator" might be a better word.

Senator Marshall: I wonder if the minister could make a statement to the Senate in the near future to let the public of Newfoundland know what the status is now, and if he would give us a schedule of any meetings that are going to take place in the near future; also what priority the government feels this position paper has in the future development of energy in the economy of Newfoundland.

Senator Olson: Yes, I will undertake to make a statement on matters that have been studied sufficiently that a decision may have been made as to future meetings or timetables but I have to caution my friend that I am not going to make a statement in anticipation of decisions by some other minister or ministry.

Senator Marshall: As co-ordinator.

THE ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION MEASURES

Hon. C. William Doody: It all comes out in time. Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for the co-ordination of the economic policy of the country. I wonder if the honourable co-ordinator would be kind enough to elaborate on the Venice summit affirmation—supported, of course, by all seven western leaders—that the battle against inflation is the number one priority and "both determined fiscal and monetary restraint is required to break inflationary expectations." I wonder if the minister could elaborate on that and tell us what exactly Canada is going to do to solve the inflationary problems that we have at the present time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister will be making a statement to Parliament when he returns to Canada respecting the objectives that he agreed to as the leader of this country. Perhaps at that time, or shortly after, he will be announcing some programs, or changes in policy, necessary to meet those commitments.

I think the honourable senator knows that Canada has always been extremely co-operative in attempts to fight inflation by trying to resist the pressures that build up in many sectors.

[Senator Marshall.]

• (1425)

I think that is particularly appropriate because Canada has been, and still is, most interested in all of those countries making a maximum effort with respect to fighting inflation, because we know that we are, on a per capita basis at least, one of the largest trading nations in the world. Therefore, a great deal of the inflation that we have in Canada at any given time is imported or is the result of those massive trading relations in terms of the percentage of our economy. It is therefore extremely important for us to have an agreement on an international level so that we can have some effect inside our country from what happens outside, because, if we do not have that kind of activity taking place on an international scale, then, of course, it does frustrate some of the actions that we take within our domestic economy to try to grapple with that important problem.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister and I will read the answer tomorrow and try to digest it. It sounded quite comprehensive. If I may be unkind enough to quote one of our more prominent columnists, it sounded like an overdose of "bafflegab".

Mr. MacEachen, in response to the same sort of question, said something to the effect that the government was contemplating no new measures aside from those policies of fiscal and monetary restraint that are in effect right now. It appears to me that one of the big problems that six of the seven partners have with the policies of Canada on an international scale, which the honourable minister just alluded to at great length and in some detail, is that the other countries appear to have come to grips with their energy costs, or at least with the costs of the consumption of fossil fuels, while Canada has not yet made any attempt to do so. Well, that is not quite true; the previous Government of Canada made some attempt, but the present Government of Canada has made no attempt to come to grips with this particular problem.

Will the honourable minister indicate whether or not any commitment has been made to our partners in the economic alliance with respect to the consumption of fuel, because it seems that our big deficit might well be tied directly to our inordinate consumption of very cheap fuel supplies?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, there is another conclusion you can also reach, which my honourable friend did not mention, and that is that it may be that Canada has done so much better than the other partners to date that we would have had a much more satisfactory situation, if they had succeeded as well as we have—

Senator Roblin: If you believe that, you will believe anything!

Senator Olson: —within the political entity that we have respecting this whole matter.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I am sure my honourable friend will not try to argue, for example, that we have not done better in Canada vis-à-vis the price of fuel or energy in the total cost package, and, therefore, in the total consideration of energy, than any other country in the world. There is just no question about that!

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Therefore, I would not accept much of the premise of my honourable friend's question, to the effect that Canada needs now to announce a whole new slate of policies to meet the commitment. It may be that some other countries need to emulate Canada's example.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Subsidizing?

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable senator for his pointers, but I should like to say at the same time that if the honourable senator suggests that we should emulate the policies of the other countries—

Senator Olson: No, the opposite. It would help if they emulated us.

Senator Doody: We should go our way and let the other six partners go theirs?

Senator Olson: No, no; I did not say that at all.

Senator Doody: Let me say that the honourable minister is absolutely correct in saying that we can have the greatest deficits in the world and have the cheapest fuel supplies in the world, but we will also have the highest unemployment in the world, eventually, and we will also have the biggest problems in the world. However,—

Senator Perrault: That sounds like the Conservative platform.

● (1430)

Senator Doody: I see that the honourable senators opposite are getting quite upset now. The facts of life have never been anything they like to grapple with.

In a speech the minister made to investment dealers in Canada, he suggested that labour was acting responsibly in appearing to moderate its claims. He went on to say that the government was moderating its claims on the resources of the country as a whole, that the private sector was not doing its part in investing more in productive capacity and that generally it was not pulling its weight.

I wonder if there is some way that we could elaborate on that theme to try to illustrate to society as a whole the manner in which the private sector could contribute more to government and unions.

Senator Olson: The simple way to answer that question is to tell the honourable senator to read the rest of the speech. If he does so, he will see that that is all spelled out in great detail.

I did congratulate labour for coming forward with more moderate demands. There is no question in my mind that that was responsible action. There is also no question in my mind that the federal government—except for a partial aberration which occurred between May 1979 and February 1980—acted responsibly in moderating its demands on society generally, and on the financial markets particularly.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator would read the rest of that speech, he would see that I expressed the hope that the chief executive officers in the boardrooms would be as reasonable, both in absolute and relative terms, as labour generally has been. There is some evidence now which indicates that that has not been the case.

I could have said then, and I will say it now, that they set a bad example by increasing their demands for rewards from the economic structure, and if they continued they would invite others to do likewise. I expressed the hope that they would refrain from doing that.

If the honourable senator reads the rest of the speech, he will find that my idea respecting what they do with the additional funds that will be generated is spelled out in great detail. He will also note that I said that they should look past the immediate 18 or 24 months and make investments in modernizing the manufacturing industry, increase investments in resources, and that sort of thing. I said that they should invest their funds in what is probably the best place in the world, Canada, rather than assisting an exodus of capital from Canada. All this is tied together with activities such as takeovers, and that sort of thing. They really do not add much, in some cases, to the economic capacity of Canada. I think the honourable senator's question is fully answered in the speech, and if he reads the speech slowly and carefully he will see that.

Senator Perrault: Read it word for word.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his advice, but I did read it as slowly and as carefully as I could. I am wondering, in passing, whether it is not better for the government to do something to encourage the private sector to invest what is left of its meager profits after taxation, and so forth, rather than give them lectures in this area from time to time.

Senator Olson: I think that both will happen. I think the government has done a number of things to encourage this sort of investment.

Regarding the last part of the senator's question, he may wish to refer to this as a lecture, and he can call it that if he wishes, but I think the private sector likes to know, from time to time, the attitude of ministers in government. That is what I was trying to do.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I pose a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline?

A few days ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was quoted as saying, in his discussions with the United States Energy Secretary Duncan at Venice, that he was looking for a reaffirmation of the American commitment that the line be built.

● (1435)

The honourable gentleman will perhaps recall that on May 13 he reported to the Senate as follows:

> I found on all sides an intense commitment to the project and a sense of urgency about proceeding with it as rapidly as humanly possible.

Would the honourable gentleman explain to us what has occurred in the interim that obliged the Minister of Energy to seek a reaffirmation that the project would be proceeded with?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is perfectly clear in my mind that the commitment that was made to me by a number of officials in the United States administration, and some of the spokesmen from Congress, was an intense commitment orally, if you like, that we get on with the job of beginning the pipeline as soon as possible and seeing it through to its final and total completion.

Unfortunately, to date, some firm, tangible evidence of that commitment has not been forthcoming—at least it has, so far, been insufficient to satisfy the terms of the Canada-U.S. agreement. I mentioned that in the statement I made in this chamber on May 13, and my honourable friend knows that we are not going to build a piece of pipeline anywhere unless we know it is going to be used when it is completed. That is pretty elementary and pretty clear.

I should add one other thing, which is really a repetition of what I said before: the prebuild does not stand alone as a means of exporting Canadian gas. We have not changed our position on that. It may be that we could reach that conclusion if that kind of application had been made to the regulatory authorities and to the Government of Canada, but that is not what it is. It is a prebuild, and it genuinely means that.

The United States so far has not given us the undertaking we need, that both the administration and the Congress are committed to see that the United States sections can be financed and will be built. That is what we require.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary question. Is it correct that U.S. Energy Secretary Duncan himself felt unable to give the Minister of Energy the type of assurances for which he was looking, including the reaffirmation of commitment?

Senator Olson: I do not think that is quite accurate, although I suppose different interpretations can be put on what Secretary Duncan has said. I do not pretend to be an expert in congressional procedure. I do not intend to be drawn into the kind of interpretation that will say precisely to the United States congressional leaders how they should go about delivering what we have asked.

What I do know is that the administration, led by the Secretary of Energy, has indicated that they would be willing to go a long, long way. Indeed, he and other leaders of Congress have indicated to me that what we were requesting was not unreasonable; that it was something that Canada is entitled to before the final construction permits are issued.

The next question that arises is how much, or what is enough? What is enough is a commitment from the United States Congress that they are in concert with the United States administration. How they deliver that, I do not believe it is my place to say. I know some things because I have been advised about certain procedures that they have for expediting resolutions through Congress, but I think it would be foolish for me to try to tell them precisely how to deliver what they acknowledge is a reasonable requirement by Canada.

LIQUEFIED NATURAL GAS CONVERSION SITES IN EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and honourable senators will understand if I am rather reluctant to use the self-conferred term "co-ordinator" because, on the contrary, I consider the economic policy of this country to be rather unco-ordinated. I am sure the minister would not want to claim responsibility for that.

The honourable minister is no doubt aware of the announcement made yesterday of the sale of liquefied natural gas from Canada's north for conversion on the Atlantic seaboard. My question relates to the conversion terminal. Would the minister tell us why the Saint John site is no longer under consideration, given the fact that the National Energy Board has already given Tenneco approval for the construction of facilities in that city?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give a precise answer to that question, nor, indeed, can I either agree or disagree that the preamble is correct. It may be; I do not know. I shall need some time to check into it and find an answer to the question.

Senator Phillips: In reference to the minister's statement concerning the preamble, may I use his favourite term and say that that is a matter of interpretation?

The news story yesterday left the impression that two sites remain under consideration, the one in the Gaspé area and the other in the Strait of Canso area. Would the minister give us an assurance that a final decision will be taken on the extension of the Q and M pipeline beyond Quebec to the maritimes? I would point out that unless this decision is taken, the maritimes site will be uncompetitive. In other words, it is necessary for the government to reverse its position on a reversible pipeline.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can only restate what I have said many times, that this government is committed to getting the entire Q and M pipeline built as expeditiously as possible. I do not know what stage has been reached in meeting the requirements the National Energy Board referred to when they did not approve construction beyond Quebec City or somewhere near Quebec City. It is our hope that these environmental matters can be resolved very quickly so we can get on with doing the whole job.

Senator Phillips: A final supplementary, honourable senators. Would the minister determine if Petro-Canada, the primary owner of the natural gas, plans to have the necessary liquefied natural gas tankers constructed in Canada?

Senator Olson: I do not know whether it has reached the stage where they are considering the letting of tenders for tanker construction and that sort of thing. However, I shall make inquiries to ascertain if it has reached that stage, and if it has done so I shall give whatever details would flow from that decision.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, on this matter of natural gas from the north, there is a report in the press today of a major deal between Petro-Canada and Gas Arctic in purchasing large volumes of gas in the Arctic islands. The report seems to indicate that the intention was that this gas would be primarily for export, but rather than exporting it directly it might be used to supply gas markets in eastern Canada and would be offset by western gas being delivered to American markets.

I wonder if the minister could enlarge on that report, if it is factual, and also if he could tell us whether this proposal would, in any way, be tied in with the matter of prebuilding the Gas Arctic pipeline to enable western Canadian gas to be moved to the United States as an alternative to the other gas being sold in eastern Canada rather than being exported.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not believe that they are linked—that is, I do not believe that the prebuild and gas flow through the prebuild is linked to this liquefied gas project at all. But I shall make inquiries as to some possible future linkage or exchange, if that is the right word, with respect to it. I think that while there is a fairly large amount of gas to be liquefied and then reconstituted at some place farther south in North America, I believe that what is under way is in some respect a pilot project as well, and therefore while the much larger volumes that would normally be involved in a pilot project seem to be indicated by this deal, I think I should check into it and find out whether they have really decided they have the technology to do the whole job or not, or whether it will be progressive on acquiring and testing new technology.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Leader of the Government? I asked him yesterday a question with respect to the initiative of the Minister of Employment and Immigration in Washington respecting the Garrison Diversion. Does he have a reply?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, after yesterday's Question Period I sought further information regarding the Garrison Diversion situation. I can report the following:

The government, together with the Province of Manitoba, has in recent days made strong expressions of concern over the possibility of new funding for the Garrison Diversion project. These concerns have been formally conveyed by our ambassador in Washington to members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to the administration.

During his visit to Washington this week the Minister for Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy—a Manitoban, by the way—made similar representations to members of Congress and the administration. He received renewed assurances from senior administration representatives that no new Garrison activity potentially affecting Canada will take place.

At present, the proposed appropriation has still not gone before the full Senate, which is expected to consider this matter later this week. While the government is concerned that the Senate Appropriations Committee earlier this week concurred in the proposed Garrison appropriation, I understand, however, that there is some support developing within the Senate for Canada's concerns over the project. It would be the hope of the government that this will be reflected in subsequent Senate consideration of the proposed appropriation. Through our embassy in Washington, we will be continuing to follow the situation very closely.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for the information, and ask him a further question on the matter. I believe the minister in question met with the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Cecil Andrus, to ask the Government of the United States, the executive branch, what they would do in the event of the bill's passing in its present form with the money for the Garrison in the appropriation. Is it true that he met with the secretary and, if so, what answer did he get to his inquiries?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. I have no additional information on the subject at this time.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) Honourable senators, I now have a statement with respect to federal aid for the construction of trade and convention centres.

After several months of review, the federal government has developed a program which will provide an ongoing basis for federal assistance for the construction of trade and convention centres in Canada.

The program is designed to assist those centres which have been shown to offer significant national and regional economic benefits. However, at the same time, the program is based on principles which reflect the government's commitment to keep its expenditures under firm control. The cabinet will therefore evaluate each application for federal assistance on its own merits, in the light of the following five principles:

(1) Federal assistance is limited to the capital costs, including land, of trade and convention centres, and in no case will the federal assistance be used to cover the operating costs of the centres;

(2) The federal contribution under this program for any one centre is not to exceed 25 per cent of the total estimated capital cost, including land, or the contribution of the provincial government, whichever is less;

(3) In any one year; total federal assistance under this program is limited to a maximum of $15 million, including land;

(4) This federal government initiative is not to cover any cost overruns; and

(5) Federal support is limited to those centres which have been shown to be economically viable. Selection of qualifying trade and convention centres will reflect the priorities of regional requirements and opportunities.

In accordance with this program, the cabinet has approved federal financial assistance for trade and convention centres in Toronto and Montreal. The subject of assistance for trade centres already brought into being without federal assistance is still under study.

In Toronto the federal government will provide 25 per cent of the total estimated capital cost, including land, of a new centre, up to a maximum of $19 million, depending on the site selected or the contribution of the provincial government, whichever is less. The federal contribution will be spread over several years.

In Montreal the government is contributing 25 per cent of the estimated capital cost of the proposed convention centre.

Other applications for assistance under this program are being received from a number of other Canadian centres, including, for example, Hamilton. The cabinet will consider each application in the light of this program and the availability of funds.

It should be noted that this program does not preclude DREE from providing additional funding where this is authorized under general development agreements.

It is estimated that there were 3,475 conventions in Canada last year, attracting some 1.4 million delegates and generating approximately $369 million in revenue. The federal government hopes this program will initially assist those cities already in competitive positions to expand this business. Canada's share of the multi-billion dollar international trade and convention market is estimated at less than one per cent. The construction of world-scale facilities in centres of international importance such as Toronto and Montreal is an essential prerequisite for improvement of Canada's penetration of this market.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I take the opportunity of asking my honourable friend two supplementary questions?

[Senator Perrault.]

First, am I correct in assuming that the Winnipeg Convention Centre is definitely included on the list of projects under consideration?

Secondly, would the government leader define for us at some convenient time what he means by the phrase "economic viability" in connection with these projects?

Senator Perrault: I shall be pleased to take both questions as notice. In my inquiry I asked specifically about the status of Winnipeg, which of course has already established a centre, as I mentioned in my remarks. I have not yet received a reply on that. But certainly the case being put forward by Winnipeg has been brought to the attention of the departmental authorities.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to a question asked by Senator Guay during Question Period yesterday, June 25, concerning the financing of the drought assistance measures announced by the Province of Manitoba.

The Manitoba Livestock Feed and Transportation Program has a budget of $40.275 million, which will be used to purchase and transport the following feedstocks: 25,000 tonnes of pellet from the Lakehead; 195,000 tonnes of Ontario hay; 50,000 tonnes of grain feed; and 50,000 tonnes of native and wild hay.

The budget is allocated as follows: transportation of pellets, $8.5 million; purchase of Ontario hay, $11.7 million; transportation of Ontario hay, $16.5 million; transportation of feed within Manitoba, $1 million; incentive for local feed production, $8 million.

The province expects to recover one-third of the transportation costs—some $5.5 million—from the railways. The sale of Ontario hay to Manitoban farmers will recover a further $11.2 million, and finally, as I indicated last night, the federal government will, of course, be discussing cost-sharing of this assistance package with Manitoban officials.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF F-18A AIRCRAFT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a fairly lengthy reply in response to questions asked by Senator Smith (Colchester) and Senator Roblin during Question Period on April 17 regarding the anticipated industrial benefits to the Atlantic provinces and Manitoba as a result of the new fighter aircraft contract. Because of the importance of this subject, I feel I should read the reply.

I wish, first, to clarify that the CF-18A is being bought "off the shelf." The offsetting business provided by McDonnell Douglas and its associated companies in the F-18 program to Canadian companies provides a limited number of opportunities to make components for the CF/F-18A.

However, a great deal of other work will be made available to Canadian companies as a result of the provisions in the contract negotiated by this government. A guaranteed proportion of this work will be in the aerospace and electronics industries. At the same time, there will also be a considerable volume of business in other industrial sectors involving purchases, investments, technology transfer, export marketing assistance, and tourism.

Honourable senators will understand that the federal government is not in a position to tell the prime contractor which individual firms it must do business with. However, we will ensure that an appropriate regional balance is maintained over the life of the contract. I am sure honourable senators will agree that Canadian firms should seek the business to which I have been referring in a competitive manner, and this makes it impossible to be precise about the exact figures for contracted work for each province or region of the country. However, I would like to give some specific examples to illustrate the type of industrial benefits I have in mind.

Firms outside of Toronto and Montreal will receive an estimated $200 million worth of work on DC-9 and DC-10 components; Bristol Aerospace of Winnipeg has already received a contract for $35 million for engine components; an estimated $75 million in subcontracts will be available to western Canada and Atlantic firms for work on the DC-10, the DC-9, the Super 80 and the KC10-A projects; McDonnell Douglas this week announced that it is inviting a number of Canadian companies to enter proposals for the manufacture of airframe assemblies for the Canadian Forces CF-18, as well as for the U.S. Navy and Marine Corps F-18A Hornet fighters, and for Hornets to be manufactured for allied nations. Included among the Canadian companies are both Enheat of Amherst and Bristol of Winnipeg.

Additionally, I should like to add some further perspective to the benefits already accruing to the various regions of the country through military expenditures. I would be remiss if I did not bring to the attention of the house the substantial operating and capital expenditures of the Department of National Defence. Information provided to me by the Department of National Defence indicates that, for example, in fiscal year 1979-80, DND had operating expenditures of $688,840,000 in Atlantic Canada, and $732,900,000 in western Canada.

● (1500)

Finally, I would like to emphasize the importance to all Canadian firms, but particularly those in the western and Atlantic provinces, of the contract provision for technology transfer and export market assistance. Used together these provisions will do much to expand existing businesses, and, indeed, to create new ventures based on new projects. I am also optimistic that the tourism development program will be of particular benefit to the western and Atlantic regions.

Honourable senators, with your permission I will place on Hansard the table I have referred to.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the third reading of Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PROHIBITION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 18, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for the second reading of the Bill S-7, to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as was explained by the sponsor, Senator Frith, this bill gives effect to the pledge our country made in signing the Bonn Declaration of 1978, that it would intensify its efforts to combat international terrorism, and, more precisely, aerial hijacking.

The Bonn Declaration was the first broad international decision ever taken to extend the active struggle against modern terrorism into the sphere of relations between states. By means of this bill, which was introduced last week in order that this decision could be announced at the Venice summit, we warn all countries who give asylum to hijackers that they stand to suffer economically from so doing. There are few countries whose air communications would not be seriously affected by the simultaneous loss of all their United States, British, French, German, Italian, Japanese and Canadian connections.

This gives rise, however, to questions that Senator Frith might answer in closing this debate, or that might be answered in committee, since I think this is the type of bill that should be referred to committee so that we might examine the practical consequences that could be envisaged as a result of its being passed.

For example, how many nations, other than the original seven, have signed the Bonn Declaration, and how many of the original signatories have enacted legislation similar to the present bill?

As Senator Frith pointed out in sponsoring the bill, there has been no absence of formal agreements or declarations by nations concerning this problem. As far back as 1972 the United Nations set up a committee to recommend ways of preventing international terrorism. They set up another committee to draft a convention against hostage-taking in 1976. As far as I know, however, nothing came of either.

Since 1970 the members of the United Nations have repeatedly urged themselves to frustrate and punish hijackers without ever a voice being raised in dissent. They have urged themselves also to ratify the International Civil Aviation Conventions of Tokyo, the Hague, and Montreal; but there is still a large number of holdouts. In other words, this has been another of those many international topics about which everybody mouths the proper platitudes and assumes the appropriate stance, but in connection with which not too many have the fortitude to bite the bullet.

The example being set by us here, and by other nations who have drafted similar legislation, it is hoped, will entice vast numbers into joining in a veritable economic war on those in the habit of harbouring aerial hijackers.

The more countries that join, the less will pirates have to gain in political demands and ransom. A pirate does not have much of a bargaining position if he knows that wherever he lands he will be arrested and either prosecuted or extradited. None of this may work out as planned, but at least this bill represents action. We have gone beyond the stage of wishful thinking and pious hopes. The bill contains concrete measures which, if we have the strength to impose them, could cause those outlaw countries who are in the habit of harbouring aerial hijackers to reflect.

One thing troubles me, however. This bill is meant to cover the type of air pirate who takes over an airplane and uses the passengers as hostages in order to make political demands or exact a ransom of some sort from one or more countries. The pirate may demand that a certain country release what he would call "political" prisoners, or he may demand that a ransom be brought to him so that he might use it to further the aims of his cause. These people are usually considered violent and have proven themselves quite capable of visiting all sorts of harm on their hostages, and, when considering such individuals, one has little trouble supporting what this bill aims to do.

[Senator Flynn.]

In reflecting on the effects of the bill, however, I find myself worrying about persons from a country behind the iron curtain, for example, who may find that their only way out is to commandeer an airplane. Let us assume they direct the pilot to land them in Austria, that they make no political demands, demand no ransom, and that all they want is political asylum after fleeing a dictatorship. If the government of Austria welcomes them and refuses to prosecute or extradite, does the full weight of the provisions of this bill then fall upon its head?

I agree, however, that the bill as drafted would enable the Governor in Council not to exact the fine that is provided.

As to the penalty provided in this bill, I, like Senator Godfrey, am concerned that the penalty provided may not be sufficient to offer much of a deterrent. The sum provided by way of a fine is $10,000, but would it be imposed once for every offence, or would that be per day? It is quite clear to me that it could be interpreted as meaning that the fine would be imposed only once. It is on matters such as this that we will need more detailed information, and therefore I would suggest that this bill be referred to a committee. I understand that the deputy leader would favour its being referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which I think is an appropriate place for it to be considered, although it could also be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. However, that committee being so busy with constitutional reform, even if it only has the Senate to consider, I suppose the best place to refer the bill is the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

• (1510)

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, once again I find myself agreeing with just about everything that Senator Flynn has said. As he has mentioned, this bill could find a home in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

I agree that the questions Senator Flynn has raised are important, and could be dealt with in committee. As he has suggested, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies, entitled: "Retirement Without Tears" tabled in the Senate on April 15, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

[Translation]

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to make a few remarks about the report of the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies, entitled Retirement Without Tears, which was tabled in the Senate on April 15, 1980.

[English]

First I want to say that I consider it a privilege to have served as a member of this special committee under the able and dynamic chairmanship of Senator David Croll. So much has already been said in favour of this man that anything I can add here would, no doubt, be considered redundant. Let me just say that whatever the true requisites for leadership are, I firmly believe they are part of Senator Croll's rich heritage.

As to the report, Retirement Without Tears, I concur wholeheartedly with all the good and positive things that have already been put on record in this chamber by those who have taken part in this debate. It is my honest opinion that the recommendations contained therein are based on the most logical and the most practical conclusions that could possibly be drawn from the great volume of evidence submitted to the committee. Needless to say, I endorse this report without reservation.

Of the many aspects which are related to the process of aging and of retirement, and which are discussed at length in the report, there is one in particular which I want to emphasize here, and that is the one discussed on page 117, in Part VIII entitled "Planning for Retirement."

Many companies, both in the private and in the public sectors, are now offering programs which are designed to prepare their employees for retirement. The committee found, however, that this idea needs to be expanded, as stated on page 119 of the report in the second to last paragraph:

> However, despite the steps that have been taken, your Committee was impressed by the lack of pre-retirement counselling programs on the part of private companies and the inadequacies of those undertaken by the public authorities. What is clear is that much more should be done to devise and implement effective programs in this country to prepare men and women for the many years they will spend in retirement.

The Canadian Association on Gerentology, in a brief presented to the committee on December 7, 1978, described the retirement process in this manner:

> After 25 to 50 years in the labour force, and most often with the same employer for the final 10-20 years, the gold watch is presented, old friends remark about how fortunate the retiree is and that's it. The retirement process has started and finished for most workers in one day; usually exactly 65 years from their date of birth. Seldom is a process as truncated as is retirement. The impact on the worker's spouse, siblings, children and other persons in the social network is likely to be even less understood and certainly unlikely to be related to a process.

In the light of the fact that some organizations today offer pre-retirement counselling, this description may sound out of date. However, it does reflect a tradition which still prevails in many quarters. The offer of a parting gift as a token of appreciation for services rendered over a lifetime career is no longer an acceptable way to mark the beginning of the retirement phase of an employee's life. This person needs to be enlightened on the subject of retirement before he or she is cast into it. I am happy to say that the idea seems to be taking hold, as today a wide variety of organizations, including unions, companies, social service agencies, and educational institutions are involved in retirement preparation programs.

Here are some of the reasons why I maintain that pre-retirement training programs are useful and necessary both to the employer and to the employee. To begin with, such programs bring assistance to the individual. In our society, considerable importance is attached to one's position in the work force. Not only is the workplace a source of identity, but work itself organizes one's daily living and gives it regularity. Retiring from the workplace can be a very difficult psychological experience because an individual must then look to other things and other places for a source of identity. Pre-retirement courses are seen as an aid in helping individuals to adjust psychologically to this transition from work to retirement.

In an article entitled "Update on Pre-Retirement Training" published in Canadian Training Methods: The Human Element, February 1980, page 22, the author, Mr. John Kenney, who has been designing and presenting retirement planning seminars for the Ontario Ministry of Education for seven years, stated that one of the assumptions and expectations voiced by organizations seeking help in designing pre-retirement programs is the belief that:

> Pre-retirement education programs will result in a smoother transition from work-oriented to a leisure-oriented lifestyle for the employee.

Thus, pre-retirement programs are seen as a vehicle by which employees can understand what retirement means within their own lives. Furthermore, these programs are also a way of sorting out personal priorities. This latter point has been poignantly described by David Huggins in "Why Pre-Retirement Counselling is so Necessary," Canadian Business, August 1977, at page 62. This article states:

● (1520)

> My problem is that I need help to sort myself out, to evaluate my financial situation, to examine my values and preferred interest, to determine whether or not I need, or prefer, to generate additional income. I need help to develop my own plan for my future, integrating all of these many and varied elements into a cohesive action plan. Finally, I would like some help to get it under way.

A second reason why pre-retirement education is important is that it will improve staff morale. There is no question but that the transition from paid employment to retirement can be a traumatic experience, particularly when the worker's identity is dependent on and closely related to his job and his workplace. Such a person can be greatly assisted and reassured by means of a training service before retirement time. In "Notes on Pre-retirement Seminar Facilitator Development," Canadian Training Methods, volume 10, No. 5, February 1978, at page 17, John Kenny writes:

> It may also be that through such organizational programs the actual health care cost to our society will be lower through the early provision of good retirement preparation, planning, counselling, assistance—this as a result of better physical, fiscal and mental health of retiring employees.

It is only reasonable to assume that the degree of productivity will necessarily be enhanced if employees have a positive mental attitude toward retirement. This is yet another reason for encouraging the proliferation of pre-retirement education among employers.

Warner Lambert Canada Limited, one private company which does maintain a full-scale pre-retirement counselling program for its employees, appeared before the committee on February 27, 1979. I quote an excerpt of its comments on this subject, taken from the report Retirement Without Tears, page 118:

> During individual pre-retirement counselling sessions, which we normally conduct two or three months prior to the employee's retirement day, we observed that many employees were totally unprepared for their retirement years; it was for them a worrisome ordeal, with lots of financial problems, loneliness and confusion . . . First of all, we felt that some of the physically and mentally fit wished to continue working. They felt they were being excluded from continuing in the work force and were not prepared for that. Financially, some were not prepared, either. In other words, they did not do any personal planning for themselves through RRSPs or annuities. We also found that, psychologically, they were not prepared for it. Many employees are afraid to admit that they are approaching 65.

Surely there is a way to reach the young worker's sensitivity to matters affecting his or her welfare and security in later years. Such vital matters as inflation, Canada/Quebec Pension Plan, Old Age Security and annuities, have now become facts of life, and it behooves every member of society to become familiar with them.

It has been noted by people who have studied the subject of retirement planning courses that a company which operates such a program stands to benefit from such a practice, in that retiring employees will leave with positive impressions regarding the manner in which they were treated and will very likely convey their thoughts to others, thereby enhancing the organization's corporate image.

David French, Assistant to the Treasurer of Simpsons-Sears Ltd., in an article entitled "Preparing for the 'Golden Years'," in the Financial Times, December 10, 1979, page 36, wrote:

> Pre-retirement counselling is one of the most dynamic areas of growth in employee benefits, and for a number of reasons . . . Rampant inflation has left a generation of employees whose ability to save has been hampered. People are living longer and are in better shape than ever before. And the breakdown of the extended family, and even the nuclear family, is bringing new problems to the fore.

As stated at page 119 of the report, although the need for pre-retirement counselling is acute, information on what is actually being done in Canada is sparse. We know that in 1975 the Department of National Health and Welfare undertook a retirement survey among workers which revealed that less than 9 per cent of the respondents had taken part in some sort of program to prepare them for retirement. Forty per cent of them, however, indicated a willingness to participate in such a program.

Those concerned with the issues of retirement generally agree that planning for retirement is important; but this has not, as yet, resulted in an overall well-developed pre-retirement program. There is evidence from the surveys that have been conducted by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and studies by the Canadian Council on Social Development in 1975 and, more recently, by the Conference Board in Canada in 1979, that a majority of employers provide information and counselling on the various benefits available from the company upon retirement, but most do not provide other forms of pre-retirement planning. I should perhaps mention again that there are companies that have highly developed counselling programs, and are doing a commendable job in this field.

Before leaving the subject, I might say that the Canada Council on Social Development's study on retirement policies found there was a consensus on the subjects which should be included in such a program. They are: (a) income and housing planning; (b) mental and physical health needs; (c) leisure; and (d) recreation and community involvement plus a variety of subjects specially adapted to local needs.

Honourable senators, I do not think it is useful for me to pursue the subject further. The special Senate committee has thoroughly examined the matter and has summarized its thoughts in the following three recommendations, with which I shall conclude my remarks: First, that both public authorities and private companies should undertake to implement effective pre-retirement programs; second, that the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission should take appropriate measures to ensure that its offices are better equipped to deal with older workers, including improved job training facilities, more vigorous placement programs, and more advertising of available services; and third, that employers should introduce programs of graduated retirement such as, for example, longer annual holidays or shorter work weeks for workers approaching the age of retirement.

On motion of Senator Bosa, for Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a possibility that Bill C-28 will come to us today. If it comes to us soon I shall ask for leave to revert to Orders of the Day. If news comes that we will not be receiving the bill until tomorrow morning, that is another matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you wish to ask for leave to revert to Orders of the Day now?

Senator Frith: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not asking that at this time.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SPRING MEETINGS AND EXTRAORDINARY PLENARY SESSION, LUXEMBOURG—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 10, 1980:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Spring Meetings and the Extraordinary Plenary Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Luxembourg, from 5th to 8th June, 1980.

He said: Honourable senators, I have just a word or two to say about this meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly, which consisted of the usual spring meetings of committees followed by an extraordinary plenary session. The plenary session was extraordinary in the sense that the normal routine in the Assembly is to have a series of committee meetings in the spring and another series of committee meetings in the fall, those being followed by a plenary session. This year's spring committee meetings took place in Luxembourg.

This was the first occasion I had had to travel abroad as a member of a Senate delegation, or to travel anywhere in that capacity, for that matter. I should like to make the usual comment about the enjoyment occasioned by meeting delegates from other countries and by working with the members of our delegation from Canada, representing the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party.

The meetings I wish particularly to refer to, however, are the committee meetings I attended, and what actually took place at the extraordinary plenary session.

Let me direct myself first to the committee meetings. I was assigned to the Military Committee, which received a most instructive briefing from a United States general as to their rapid deployment forces and plans. I can only say that it was instructive. Being a "new boy" I did not participate to a great extent in that committee's deliberations. I was concerned, however—and this is perhaps the only aspect that would be of any interest to senators in any event—to ask questions concerning whether the United States should be taken in any way as reducing or changing its commitment to NATO by reason of its need to protect its interests, and the interests of its allies, in the parts of the world outside the defined NATO area. I was assured that no such intention existed.

I should say, parenthetically, that some of the European members of NATO were glad that that question had been raised by a North American delegate rather than by any of them, because it was a question that had been in their minds but which they felt rather diffident to raise.

My remarks now are concerned with the reason for the extraordinary plenary session which took place at the European Centre in the city of Luxembourg. Again, if I may make a short parenthetic comment, I should like to underline how impressed I was, as I believe all Canadian delegates were, with the beautiful country of Luxembourg and that beautiful city and the hospitality we received there. This was the first occasion on which the very handsome Assembly Hall at the European Centre in Luxembourg had been used. Those of you who have read the current issue of Maclean's magazine will realize that there is a somewhat ironic dimension to the fact that that beautiful Assembly Hall in the European Centre was used for the first time on this occasion. The committee rooms had been used before, but this was the first time that the Assembly Hall had been used.

The irony I am referring to, as outlined in Maclean's magazine, is that Luxembourg, which depends a good deal on the tourist industry and all of the benefits that flow from that, benefited from the attendance and work of the European delegates and their support staff. Although the European Parliament, it is said, offered to establish Luxembourg as a permanent centre, that offer, for reasons that are explained in the article, was turned down. Now there is understandably some regret that the offer was not accepted. I can certainly understand why regret would be felt on the part of Luxembourg, and indeed others, that parts of the impressive facilities that constitute the European Centre may fall into some disuse.

Now, if I may come back to the point, the reason for holding that extraordinary plenary session this spring, when a plenary session is not normally held, was the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. Senator Yuzyk, who was also a member of the delegation, will be telling us a good deal more about other aspects of what took place in Luxembourg, but the aspect I should like to concentrate on is the resolution that was produced, called "Resolution 96 on Afghanistan and Related Issues."

Honourable senators received today from Honourable Senator van Roggen, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, a copy of the resolution on Afghanistan. In his accompanying memorandum, Senator van Roggen says:

> The officers of the North Atlantic Assembly have asked that I bring the enclosed copy of a Resolution on the situation in Afghanistan, which was adopted at a session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Luxembourg, on June 7th, 1980, to your attention.
> This Resolution was agreed to overwhelmingly, with one vote cast against it and ten abstentions.

I should say that the rules of the North Atlantic Assembly provide that delegates must vote on their own. They do not vote en bloc. So when the vote was put, each delegate voted. I was one of those who abstained. I wish to explain why I abstained from voting in support of the resolution condemning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Senator Roblin: Your explanation had better be good.

Senator Frith: My reason is as follows: When the final resolution, which had been hammered out in committee meetings, was presented to our delegation on the morning of the plenary session, we found that to a clear condemnation of the Russian invasion of Afghanistan had been added five other subparagraphs. I did not agree with some of those subparagraphs, and I felt, moreover, that some were not government policy. At least, that was my opinion. I therefore tried to persuade our delegaton that we should not vote for the other five items but should vote only for the main item. Leaving aside the various recitals leading up to the Assembly's urging the member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance to do certain things, this is the part I was prepared to support:

● (1540)

> 1. to continue to press for the total and immediate withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan and to support efforts aimed at a political solution that provides for the withdrawal of these forces and for a guarantee of the territorial integrity and self-determination of Afghanistan—

After some debate within our own delegation, we agreed that it would be Canada's position at the session that afternoon to support that. However, we were unable to report unanimous support on the other five subheadings. Honourable senators will find copies of those subheadings on their desks. In fact, at the session we entered the debate, and our chairman, Leonard Hopkins, M.P. and Michael Forrestall, M.P., took the position that Canada was not prepared to support unanimously the five subparagraphs, but was unanimously in favour of the main paragraph.

There was some debate involving changing or amending some of the subparagraphs. Without going into too much detail, I can say that there seemed to be an invitation to extend the boundaries of NATO so that NATO would be involved in Southwest Asia and the Gulf, which may have been a good idea. My feeling was that that was not the way to bring that about. If the idea was to extend NATO's boundaries, I felt that we should debate that directly and not have it piggybacked on the main motion, which we were all prepared to support.

In any event, when the vote came, most of our delegation felt, since the amendments and attempts to withdraw the other six had failed—that is, that they had not got a sufficient majority to drop the other five subparagraphs—that Canada should support the United States because it was essentially a motion drafted by the United States. We felt we should support the motion in total.

I was unable to do so in conscience. Our delegates explained why we did not wish to support the others, though still they had not been withdrawn or amended. Therefore, of the Canadian delegation, the New Democratic delegate and myself abstained from voting, and all other members of the delegation voted in favour of the motion. Because that was a rather unusual and, perhaps, impulsive or ill-considered step, some might think, for a new boy to take in such an august body as the North Atlantic Assembly, I felt I should give a general report and, in case it came up, explain, or as my colleague Senator Lamontagne has said, confess it. But I want to say that I am, to this day, unrepentant, and if given the opportunity, I would do the same thing again.

Honourable senators, that is all I wish to say regarding the Inquiry. I would be pleased to entertain questions, although I do not think there will be any because of the simple, lucid and sincere explanation of my conduct as a member of the Canadian delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly meeting in Luxembourg earlier this month.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: To use the euphemism, "before the honourable gentleman takes his seat." I wonder if he would receive a question from me.

Recalling his speech in the last Parliament on Senator Bosa's suggestion that we provide for abstention from voting in this house, a speech in which Senator Frith did a most excellent job on me and marshalled a magnificent argument, and now having heard his own lucid and excellent defence about his abstention in another very important body, has he had any change of heart, and could we expect, if Senator Bosa and I were to again put forward our views, a little gentler treatment from our good friend?

Senator Frith: I wish I could say yes, but it seems to me that I have pointed out why I think the present rule is a good rule, and why I am even prepared to observe that rule in this chamber to explain my abstention from voting in another forum. All the present rule says is that if one is going to abstain, one should explain why. I have explained why I abstained in Luxembourg. I have even come back to Canada and explained why I abstained in Luxembourg. That is why I feel the present rule should stay as it is, but if the treatment I gave you last time was in any way considered rough, I should certainly make it more gentle, but I will not change my point of view.

Senator Macquarrie: I might add that I hope Senator Frith does not think that I am complaining. In fact, I have spent my whole life being criticized. I am lonely without it. I thought he made an excellent speech. This was a little attempt at humour because I understand we are sort of filling in time while waiting for a bill to arrive.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I seem to recall that the words of Senator Frith in the debate on the amendment to rule 49, which would have permitted senators to abstain without explaining the reason for abstaining, were to the effect that one had to have the intestinal fortitude to stand up and be counted. I am wondering now whether Senator Frith has modified his view on this particular topic, and whether, if I reintroduced this motion, I would have his support.

Senator Frith: I think that is virtually the same question. I would not be so immodest as to suggest that I had the intestinal fortitude today to explain why I abstained in Luxembourg. Perhaps it was imprudent to explain it, but there it is. Whether it was intestinal fortitude, or whatever, it seems to me that, in spirit, both in Luxembourg and here, I observed the intention and spirit of rule 49 as it now stands. With respect, my behaviour has been entirely consistent with my stand when rule 49 was before the Senate for consideration.

Honourable senators, I have received the good news that Bill C-28 has arrived from the other place. I thank Senator Macquarrie and Senator Bosa for helping me engage some attention while we awaited its arrival, and I would ask honourable senators for permission to revert to Orders of the Day.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Before doing so, I wish to move the adjournment of the debate on this inquiry on behalf of Senator Yuzyk.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: With leave, honourable senators, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, Bill C-28 is a measure to amend and extend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, and is intended to aid small, independent fishermen by helping to finance a number of fishery improvement projects, such as repair of vessels and equipment. It is directed toward ongoing operations of the smaller independent fishermen rather than the building of large trawlers.

● (1550)

The new legislation specifies the amount that can be outstanding to an individual borrower at any time, increasing it from $75,000, as it now is, to $150,000, as well as the maximum term of each loan extending it from 10 years, as it now is, to 15 years. It also lays down the total principal amount of guaranteed loans that may be made by all lending institutions in a lending period, and what that lending period will be.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans took over the administration of this act in June 1978 from the Department of Finance, which department had been administering the program from 1955, when the legislation first became effective. Many fishermen depend upon this act, and it is in their interest that the amendments be approved as quickly as possible since the present legislation terminates on June 30, 1980, a matter of only a few days away.

The rate of interest on the loans under the act is set at one per cent over the prime lending rate of the chartered banks. This fluctuates, of course, with changes in the prime lending rate for the duration of the loan. The legislation is a great help to fishermen in that it facilitates credit for them and permits them to operate as free entrepreneurs.

Since Canada's fishing zone was extended to 200 miles in 1977, there has naturally been increased fishing. Loans made by chartered banks and other lenders under the act have increased a great deal in the past few years. In 1978-79, for example, loans under the act amounted to $28 million, which was 55 per cent higher than the amount in the previous fiscal year, and there are indications that the total could reach $35 million this year.

This indicates a need for an increase in the total financial ceiling on guaranteed loans under the legislation. The amendments provide that the aggregate principal amount of loans will be raised from the present $80 million to $250 million for the three-year lending period.

With the extension of Canada's fishing zone, fishermen now are obliged to make longer trips, and they need more efficient vessels to harvest the fish and retain its quality until they reach the processing plant. In addition, the cost of vessels and equipment has, of course, increased because of inflation and other factors.

The guaranteed loans program carried out under this act provides a stable source of credit to many fishermen, in the absence of which such credit would be less available from the banking community, particularly during those times when the market is sluggish.

On the west coast, where there are no subsidies and no provincial loan boards, this program has become increasingly important and popular with fishermen. In the fiscal year 1978-79, for example, British Columbia fishermen accounted for nearly 45 per cent of the number of loans for all of Canada, and 83 per cent of the dollar value of the loans that were made. Where provincial schemes are available, the demands placed on the legislation are not as great, although it is used in the Atlantic provinces as well. In Newfoundland, for example, the number of loans guaranteed under the act increased substantially in the 1978-79 fiscal year. Extension of the program is obviously much less costly than direct subsidies.

I should like to emphasize particularly that since its inception the loss on this program has been less than three-quarters of one per cent of the total loans guaranteed. In addition, this approach of providing credit availability to fishermen is in line with current fisheries policy.

It should also be noted that all loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act must be secured in the regular manner. Security is taken in the form of a chattel mortgage on the item purchased, or sometimes a mortgage on real property. The lender is given a written promise by the borrower to repay the loan. Other terms and conditions are worked out between the applicant and the lender.

Lenders make loans with the same care taken in the conduct of their ordinary business and use normal commercial lending practices in drawing up agreements and in servicing the loans.

I am sure honourable senators know that this legislation has had general all-party support. In view of the time element, I am sure they will want to give it that support as well.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

June 27, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of June, at 4.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,

Ottawa.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, July 8, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Hopkins had been substituted for that of Mr. Joyal on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

CANADA DAY

CELEBRATIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the presentation of petitions, I wish to inform you of the plans for celebrations on Parliament Hill on July 1 next, celebrations to which, of course, all senators are invited.

From 10.30 to 11.00 a.m. there will be a carillon concert. The invited guests will begin to arrive at 10.30 to attend the concert.

There will be roped-off areas on either side of the centennial flame with chairs to accommodate 200 on a first-come-first-served basis. Standing room for an additional 200 will also be available. Entry to the area will be by ticket, and seats will be held until 11.20 a.m. Thereafter the general public will be admitted. Tickets have not yet been delivered to us, and we should consult the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to obtain them.

At 10.55 a.m. the Prime Minister will arrive and be met by the Honourable Francis Fox, P.C., M.P. and Mrs. Fox. At 11.00 a.m. the Ceremonial Guard will march onto the lawn from the southwest corner. At 11.20 a.m. the Governor General and Mrs. Schreyer will arrive by car. At 11.21 a.m. there will be the royal salute followed by inspection and the march past.

● (1110)

The barriers will go up at 9 a.m. and senators will be allowed through the barriers with their cars if they wish, but they should have identification with them. Parking will be in area 361, which is behind the Centre Block.

I will have a copy of these notes mimeographed and sent around to honourable senators.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I am pleased that Senator Frith has brought to the attention of the Senate the celebration of Canada's birthday on Parliament Hill. I should like to add a few words since I am the only parliamentary representative on the National Board of Canada's Birthday Celebrations.

This year the government allotted only a modest amount for these celebrations and wanted above all, that the show on Parliament Hill would not be a government show but would be presented by the citizens of Ottawa. The money allotted for Canada's birthday celebrations was to encourage the involvement of citizens right across the country from coast to coast, from the 49th parallel right up to the Arctic, and, above all, the involvement of every man, woman and child, if possible.

We have organized over 3,000 events in every community we could contact, and this will probably be the first time that we shall have involvement of citizens across the land. This is good for Canada. There are many reasons that we should be proud to be Canadians. This is a God-given land to us. We probably have the richest natural resources in the world, at least we rank with those countries that do. And Canada is rich in human resources, and it is these resources, combined with our natural resources, that make Canada great. What is even more important is the Canadian spirit. Canada is not only a combination of natural resources and human resources, it is an act of faith, and July 1 is the time to demonstrate our love of country and our pride in it.

I am bringing this to the attention of honourable senators, and all parliamentarians, in the hope that those of you who return to your communities for Canada Day will attend and take an active part in your local celebrations, thus encouraging Canadians to be proud of this country of ours. It will be a demonstration of our unity and our patriotism.

The events that have been organized across the country are sponsored by the Council for Canadian Unity, a voluntary organization, and by the Canadian Folk Arts Council, also a voluntary organization, of which I am president. We are also celebrating this year the 375th anniversary of the settlement of the Acadians, and the 75th anniversaries of Saskatchewan and Alberta. These will get national coverage, and the celebrations on the Hill will get partial national coverage. Therefore, the attempt this year will be to have Canadians of all origins, living in every region, district and community in Canada, celebrate Canada's birthday. "Canada, it's you and me"—"Le Canada, c'est toi et moi."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

REQUEST FOR TELEVISION COVERAGE OF ROYAL ASSENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding to the Order of Business, may I ask Senator Perrault to inform the Senate the nature of a request he received from the CTV network?

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a few moments before 11 o'clock this morning I was contacted by a representative from the CTV network in anticipation of the historical event which might take place this afternoon, the possibility of royal assent being given to a bill relating to Canada's National Anthem. This network has requested the opportunity, together with the CBC and Global Television, to have pooled television coverage for royal assent later this day.

The matter is not for the government to decide. I pass this information along because it is a Senate matter for all members of the Senate to consider, if they wish, at some point. I presume that in order to meet the very difficult time frame there could be procedural and technical challenges involved.

All I can report is that a request has been received. I convey to honourable senators the information that has been given to me.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on proceedings under the Canada Labour Code, Part III (Labour Standards), for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 75 of the said Code, Chapter L-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Agreement to provide loan insurance between the Government of Canada and Chrysler Canada Ltd. and Chrysler Corporation, dated June 13, 1980.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Paul C. Lafond, for Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Friday, June 27, 1980

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its third report as follows:

In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, and to its further reference set out in its first report of this session and approved by both Houses on June 4, 1980, empowering the committee to conduct a comprehensive study of the means by which Parliament can better oversee the government regulatory process, your committee recommends:

That it be given authority to send five (5) members of the committee and one (1) Committee Counsel to the conference of the committees on Subordinate Legislation of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth to be held in Canberra, Australia, from September 29 to October 3, 1980.

Respectfully submitted,

John M. Godfrey
Joint Chairman

Senator Lafond moved that the report be taken into consideration on Wednesday, July 9, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—DEVELOPMENT AND EXPORT OF HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure he is aware of the meeting which took place yesterday between the premiers of the eastern provinces and the governors of the New England States and the welcome news of the possibility of an offer of some $46 billion to be spent by American interests to develop hydro-electric power in Labrador, Quebec and Ontario.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government, on behalf of his government, would ensure that before the National Energy Board's and other necessary approval is given for such massive investment, the federal government will take steps to ensure that the Province of Newfoundland is able to deal with those states on a one-to-one basis, and that the federal authority will be employed to ensure that power produced in Labrador can be sold directly to consumers, be they American or Canadian.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question must be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: In view of the conditions set forth by some of the premiers in those discussions, specifically those of Premier Peckford of Newfoundland and Premier MacLean of Prince Edward Island—I am sure the Leader of the Government is aware of the difficulty which Newfoundland will have in transmitting that power across the province of Quebec—and in view of the fact that Premier MacLean wants assurance that the energy requirements of Prince Edward Island will be looked after before power is transmitted to other areas, would the Leader of the Government provide us with the information on the action of the intercedence of the federal government in those negotiations, negotiations which mean so much for the Atlantic region?

Senator Perrault: An inquiry will go forward. Hopefully, a statement can be made the next time we meet.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS—SALARIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to direct my question to the Leader of the Government. Yesterday, the Prime Minister's office announced the reversal of a decision taken by the previous government to make public the salaries paid to the more than 2,000 cabinet appointees. The reason cited is that there is a certain "sensitivity" about disseminating details on the salaries of such individuals. Would the Leader of the Government inquire as to whose sensitivity is being offended by the release of this information?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I presume the information given by the distinguished Senator Muir is from a newspaper or magazine account. I have no information concerning the points raised by him. Indeed, this government has, I think, a well-deserved reputation for being very open in its sharing of information with the public.

Senator Flynn: I wouldn't go that far.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary. I thank the honourable senator for his usual kindness and courtesy. I am referring to a newspaper item put out by Canadian Press, which, as we know, is pretty well on.

I think this is a startling decision, especially coming on the eve of the introduction of the government's freedom of information legislation—or, should I say, restriction of information legislation.

Would the leader kindly assure us that should Canadians in the next few weeks indicate their sensitivity to the withholding of this information, the government will reverse this incredible decision, particularly in view of the fact—and I am sure he will agree that this is quite correct—this so-called decision is one taken less than a week after a speech by the Honourable James Fleming, Minister of State for Multiculturalism, and Chairman of the Cabinet Communications Committee, to the effect that Ottawa plans to loosen the rules on release of government information to the public.

The Honourable James Fleming said:

> We have to restore respect and trust between the governed and their government—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: You certainly do.

Senator Muir: He made that remark when speaking of the intention to introduce freedom of information legislation, and he concluded by saying:

> We in government can help by being more open, more communicative.

• (1125)

Would the honourable gentleman please allay these fears and come back with a report to the Senate to confirm that there is no intention whatever of restricting any information with regard to any matter—except understandably, in certain areas involving military or defence matters—but particularly with respect to these 2,000 cabinet appointees?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is heartening to note the manner in which an important member of the opposition in the Senate has quoted from a very fine speech delivered by one of the members of government, the Honourable James Fleming. Certainly, this government has established access to information and freedom of information as top priorities for this Parliament. I believe that all Canadians will be pleased with proposals to be advanced by the government in this area.

Secondly, the quotation by Senator Muir is from a newspaper account. I have not had the opportunity to study the complete text. It appears to be taken, at least in part, out of context, and I am sure this was not done deliberately by Senator Muir. Inquiries will go forward and further information will be sought.

Senator Muir: The leader can be well assured that it was not deliberately taken out of context. It is in black and white here. If it is incorrect, then I am sure, as all politicians say, the Honourable James Fleming can say, "I was misquoted." But would the leader be good enough to check into it a little further and bring a report back, as I find the Leader of the Government always does.

Senator Perrault: That commitment is accepted.

Hon. Charles McElman: Would the Leader of the Government agree that the authenticity and accuracy of the report referred to by Senator Muir perhaps could be judged by the fact that it included a reference to senators as those whose salaries would not be made public?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government and draw on just a modest portion of that openness which was mentioned a while ago. This is in the aftermath of the secret artillery conference held at the Conference Centre. Discussion in the media—and I am sorry I have not read the Liberal cabinet ministers' speeches recently but I have read the media—is to the effect that consideration is being given by the Canadian government actually to acquire some ownership of Space Research Corporation which will put us in a role with the Government of South Africa. I should like to ask the minister, in the light of the very, very serious and unfavourable publicity which has been produced about this particular company, if he can tell us if the Government of Canada, through any of its branches, agencies or corporations, is giving consideration to buying into Space Research Corporation Limited, and, further, if the government has plans to continue forms of aid which have already been given or if, at least, the whole matter will be frozen until certain legal processes have been concluded.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

[Senator Muir.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

RESPONSIBILITY TO CABINET

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In light of the further revelations at the Macdonald Commission inquiry that some members of the RCMP disclosed information to the minister, some did not, and others only doing so if they were asked, can the leader assure us that there is now in place and working a procedure and practice that overcomes this circus and ensures to the people of Canada that the minister responsible is informed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question must be taken as notice as well.

• (1130)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CUBAN REFUGEES—CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to reply to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on June 3 regarding Cuban refugees. In his question Senator Nurgitz stated:

> It is my understanding that 32 of the 70 Cuban persons who have been able to get out of their country, and who have applied for and received permission to come to Canada, have indeed arrived today.

He then asked for confirmation that only 70 people out of the quota of 300 had in fact applied to come.

The bulk of those Cubans who have left Cuba are interested in settlement in the United States. The Employment and Immigration Commission interviewed the Cuban "asylees" in Costa Rica who were interested in living in Canada and selected approximately 70 persons—the majority of those who applied.

As there have been no further movements of Cuban migrants to Costa Rica, we would not anticipate further applications from Cubans in that country.

The original Canadian offer to accept up to 300 Cuban asylum seekers was stimulated by the plight of those Cubans who had lodged themselves in the Peruvian embassy in Havana. That situation has now been resolved.

The Employment and Immigration Commission is currently examining whether Canada should select Cubans, up to the total of 300, who are currently in Peru and who might wish to live in Canada. It is not the intention of the Employment and Immigration Commission at the present time to select Cubans for entry into Canada from among those who have entered the United States by boat.

JUSTICE

POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that a certain individual, who was caught trying to bring into Canada six pounds of marijuana, was recently given a minimal sentence for personal possession only, will the minister inform us whether any direction will be given to the courts or whether any legislation will be proposed to specify the exact amount of marijuana that will be regarded as possession for personal use only?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I wish to thank the honourable senator for giving me prior notice that that question would be asked today. I have not as yet received the required information from the Minister of Justice, but it will be provided as soon as possible.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MARIJUANA—NATIONAL EDUCATION PROGRAM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have a supplementary question to direct to the leader. In view of the recent alarming information that marijuana is more harmful to health than previously stated by medical researchers, and in view of the shocking statistics indicating that marijuana use in Canada has increased, even among primary school-aged individuals, what is the reason for the inaction or the long delay by the responsible federal ministries in launching an intensive national educational program aimed at decreasing the trafficking in and the use of marijuana?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that the senator's suggestion will be considered conscientiously by the government. The senator's background in the ministry and his professional background will add great weight to his suggestion.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government aware of whether any agreement has been reached in the other place concerning the lyrics of O Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): At last report I was given to understand that they are now singing in harmony in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Not yet!

Senator Bosa: If I may ask a supplementary, I am glad they are singing in harmony, but are they also singing the same words?

Senator Flynn: He has a good point.

• (1135)

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has voiced a concern which may be shared by other members of this house. I understand, however, that in the other place they are singing with a remarkable degree of harmony, and at last report the lines were identical.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hicks for second reading of Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would first thank the sponsor of the bill for his introduction and explanation. I am sure the sponsor will not be surprised if we do not find all the rather imaginary benefits that he found in Bill C-28, but that does not detract from our appreciation of its explanation and introduction

When a group of Canadians get together, the most popular topic of conversation is that of the rising cost of living and inflation. The average Canadian would find very little to complain about if he would stop and consider the difficulty facing the average fisherman. The fisherman faces rising costs, particularly for fuel, and it is a situation that is not going to improve. He also faces rising costs for items such as salt, nets, traps, and so on. In essence, honourable senators, you name the problem and the fisherman will tell you that the costs are increasing.

One item essential to commercial fishing is a boat. Everyone has to have a boat, and perhaps that would be the ideal subject to use when illustrating this subject of increased costs. In 1970 the cost of an average 45-foot lobster boat was $11,000. That was not very long ago. It is a short, scant, mere 10 years ago. This year the same lobster boat costs $50,000. Ten years ago a friend of mine in Prince Edward Island purchased his first boat for $9,000. Last year he paid $30,000 for a similar boat. But he did a good deal of the work himself and received a federal fishing vessel subsidy.

Senator Frith: How large a boat was that?

Senator Phillips: Forty-five feet. In mentioning the fishing vessel subsidy, I introduce a further complication. That subsidy, in the words of the fishermen, has been put on ice. Senator Frith will recall that I have been asking questions on this program for a period of some weeks, and I have received information to the effect that it will continue; but no one knows under what formula or when. That has further delayed construction of new boats, and it certainly affects Bill C-28.

Honourable senators are familiar with those various stories which begin, "Which do you want first, the good news or the bad?" I would like to be able to give you good news concerning the fishermen, but unfortunately I cannot. I have to give you a double dose of bad news. One would expect that with rising costs a fisherman would receive more for his product. Unfortunately, that is not the case. This year lobster fishermen in my area are receiving 30 cents a pound less than they received last year, and 9 cents a pound less for cod, while mackerel is at about the same price as last year. This is hardly a situation to encourage a fisherman to approach a bank manager for a $150,000 loan. Has anyone considered how a fisherman, in the light of all the adverse conditions I just mentioned, will be able to meet interest payments of approximately $15,000 per year? I do not feel it can be done.

● (1140)

In his explanation, the sponsor of the bill said that the interest rate would fluctuate. Now, this fact causes me some considerable concern. It is sound practice, when borrowing for business purposes, to know what the interest payments will be each year, and under Bill C-28 this is going to be impossible. Every Friday morning the fisherman will have to phone the local bank manager and ask what interest rate he is paying on his loan this week.

The Conservative opposition in the House of Commons introduced an amendment proposing that the interest rate be fixed during the term of the loan, in much the same way as a mortgage interest rate is fixed for a certain period. I think it was rather unfortunate that this amendment was not accepted, but in view of the fact that there was some difficulty concerning the propriety of the amendment, I will not propose that we go into that any further at this time.

The impression is generally created, honourable senators, that these loans are guaranteed by the government. Various newspaper reports, commenting on the passage of this bill, say that the loans are guaranteed by the government. I would like, for a moment, to review the guarantees on these loans. They are as follows: Ninety per cent of the first $125,000 per lending institution—not the individual loan but the lending institution—50 per cent on the next $125,000, and the balance of the loan receives a 10 per cent guarantee.

Let us assume that a lending institution such as a chartered bank—the Royal Bank, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce or the Bank of Montreal, and since I don't think I owe money to any other banks I guess I don't need to mention any more—makes a total loan of $5 million. Of the $5 million they would receive a guarantee on $657,000. I suggest, honourable senators, that the loan guarantee is not so generous that the bank will be mailing out publicity to the fishermen.

It is of interest to note that since the inception of the program in 1955 there have been 11,493 loans approved. This means that we are discussing approximately 450 loans per year, or roughly two loans per banking day. Mention has been made of the urgency of passing this legislation before June 30. I suggest that there is something a little bit phoney about this urgency, because I do not think the banks are going to approve very many loans on Dominion Day, and, furthermore, the loss of two bank loans per day, honourable senators, will not exactly spoil the Canadian fishing industry.

The sponsor of the bill, in his remarks, referred to other forms of assistance that are available to fishermen on the Atlantic coast. He pointed out that fishermen on the Atlantic coast do not take the same advantage of the act as those on the Pacific coast. The reason for that is rather obvious. In the province of Quebec, fishermen receive their loans interest free, and one would have to be very much of a separatist to pay interest on $150,000 when he can get the money from the provincial government for nothing. Even New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are generous enough to pay a portion of the interest on money borrowed by fishermen. I suggest that not many fishermen in Come-By-Chance will chance a loan under this act; rather, they will go to the provincial government.

Senator McIlraith: Even Newfoundland?

Senator Phillips: Yes, even Newfoundland. That was for the benefit of your whip, Senator McIlraith.

There seems to be some contradiction between the annual report under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, and the increase in funds available under Bill C-28. The last available report indicates that in 1977 the average loan made under the act was $20,000. In 1978 it had dropped back to $19,000, and despite the fact that the average loan is decreasing, we are saying, "We will double the maximum from $75,000 to $150,000." This is so much window dressing. It reminds me of the type of advertising that Senator Davey proposes to the Liberal Party at election time.

Senator Marshall: Fishy!

Senator Flynn: Apparently it is efficient!

Senator Phillips: It seems to get by on TV, but it does not seem to get much further than that, Senator Flynn.

One of the most frequent complaints I receive—and I received this from the provincial minister of fisheries—is that there is no federal appeal board under the fisheries program. Farmers who benefit from similar legislation have an appeal board. I would suggest that the government consider legislation of this type. Indeed, I was rather pleased to read that the committee of the other place, as suggested by the minister, is presently studying a proposal to establish a corporation for fishermen's loans similar to the Farm Credit Corporation. I hope it will get on with the job and I wish it luck.

● (1150)

One weakness of this bill is that so much depends upon the attitude of the local bank manager. A bank manager in one community may be willing to lend money under this bill, but 50 miles away in another fishing community, the bank manager may be completely unwilling to lend the money. A bank manager may lend what higher management considers to be too much money in one community, and a new manager is sent in with instructions to collect that money. As all honourable senators know, the fisherman's income fluctuates from year to year depending on his catch and the price received. This often creates a great deal of hardship when a new bank manager comes in with instructions to collect what is owing.

Honourable senators, after the adjournment yesterday, the sponsor of the bill spoke to me about this bill's going to committee. I should explain that neither of us have any objection to its going to committee, and if we want a committee meeting on Monday, I am sure we will both be there. However, I really do not see the need for this bill to be referred to committee. I think it would be rather embarrassing, honourable senators, for the minister to appear before a committee and attempt to find any benefit in this bill. I am sure if the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans had to do that it would spoil his Dominion Day weekend, and even the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should be entitled to enjoy our national holiday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to spend about five minutes in picking up a few points contained in Bill C-28, and which have been contained in the legislation since its inception in the early 1970s.

Senator Phillips made mention of the banks which are responsible, to some extent, for granting these loans. At the outset, I should like to say that we have three types of similar loans—fisheries improvement loans, farm improvement loans and loans for small businesses. Why they are in existence I do not know, because you must go to the bank to get the loan. If a fisherman is a good risk, the bank manager will steer him away from the preferred rate of interest and charge him the regular rate of interest, and that he should not do. Then he will take the fisherman's house, family, and everything he owns as security. Therefore, there is no offer of venture capital to allow fishermen to get into the business they might want to get into even although they may have a licence.

The bank manager is not helping, and the government is doing nothing about it. As a matter of fact, during one of the committee hearings, government officials were asked how many loans were turned down, and they did not know. They brag about all the loans that are granted, but they do not know how many are being turned down because of the idiosyncrasies of the bank manager in that locale. There must be a direction which demands that the banks have a responsibility in this case. Indeed, they should be handling the whole thing instead of the bureaucrats who, every time you write to them and ask why a loan was turned down, tell you it is the responsibility of the banks.

The fisherman is not gaining anything other than the fact that he might be ascertained to be a good risk which he probably was in the first place, and he would have been granted the loan in any event. The same applies to farmers and small businessmen.

There is a contradiction in that you can put all the millions of dollars you want into improvement loans and all the millions of dollars you want into the aggregate total that is going to be directed to the fishing industry, but at the same time the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is worried about the number of fishermen exploiting the fish, so it is cutting down on licences, on quotas and on subsidies.

Senator Phillips referred to the Fisheries Loan Board in the province of Newfoundland. It is granting loans at a very low rate of interest; I believe it is three or four per cent. However, in order to get that loan to get the boat he wants, the fisherman has to receive a subsidy from the federal government, but three years ago the federal government stopped giving those subsidies because it did not have any money.

How many fishermen are writing to their MPs or senators to find out what is going on? There is insufficient communication to the fisherman as to whether he qualifies for a loan. He might go to the bank and get a loan, and yet he does not have a proper fishing licence.

The other matter that should be of concern to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is the fact that you can put all the money you want into buying fishing boats, but there are insufficient supporting facilities such as icebreaker services and marine centres across the country to assist and support the fishermen who are now using long liners which cost not $100,000 but as much as $700,000. These vessels are a major investment, and they contain sophisticated communications equipment. In this respect the benefits derived from this bill will not go very far, and the government should not brag about doing something wonderful for the fishermen.

However, every little piece that the government gives out can be used, but there is certainly too much restriction on the direction of assistance that should be given to the fishing industry.

Two or three years ago I recall the problem with the river guardians who protect our little rivers for sport fishing, including salmon and lobster fishing. The rivers could not be protected by having enough guardians on patrol because of lack of funds. The money was only sufficient to pay the guardians to patrol the rivers for three months, and for the other months of the season poaching was rampant and it destroyed sport fishing and eliminated the offsetting benefits which occur across the country.

I presume there is some good in everything the government does, regardless of which government it is. However, after so many years with this program in place, I think the government should ask the fishermen, to whom the benefits are directed, and find out what their problems are instead of hearing them through a bank manager who could not care less as long as he makes his profit for the authorities in Toronto. The government should find out directly from the fishermen what the problems are and amend the legislation to make the necessary improvements.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my comments are mostly ones of concurrence in what has been said by Senator Phillips and Senator Marshall. I believe that this amendment was probably imposed on the minister because time was running out.

On many occasions in the past I have had discussions on the whole subject of loans to fishermen with various federal ministers. I always came out with the impression that the minister, whoever he may have been at that time, felt that something should be done. I must honestly say, honourable senators, as far as this bill is concerned, it does not do anything. It does not do anything because of the facts that have been mentioned by the two previous senators who spoke on this bill.

Honourable senators, before the New Brunswick Fishermen's Loan Board, which has done a great job over the years, will permit a loan to be granted, it must know if there is going to be a federal subsidy. That subsidy program is on a federal level, and has been over the years on an ad hoc basis.

● (1200)

I am sure I speak for all the fishermen of the Atlantic provinces in saying that there has been an improvement since Roméo LeBlanc became Minister of Fisheries, and I believe that my colleagues from Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland—

Senator Marshall: Even Newfoundland!

Senator Thériault: —found that out after the election of February 18 last, because almost every riding where the fishing industry was an economic factor sent Liberal members to the House of Commons. That speaks for itself, but it does not satisfy me as far as this bill is concerned.

There is a problem this year with markets, as mentioned by Senator Phillips. The real problem as far as the provincial Fishermen's Loan Board and the fishermen were concerned was the interim period between 1979 and 1980 when the then Minister of Fisheries cut out completely subsidies to the boatbuilding industry and to the fishermen, and now the present minister is faced with trying to do something about it with a budget that included nothing for that program during the past year.

I cannot speak for the west coast fishermen or the inland fishermen, but since the inception of this kind of legislation I have never been convinced that it was designed to accomplish anything for the Atlantic fishermen, even with this amendment.

Senator Flynn: I will not make any comment.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I have a question for the sponsor of the bill. Can he tell me what the law is in the Territories, or anywhere else in Canada for that matter, for people buying boats of more than 40 feet in length? Is it necessary to have a captain's licence to operate such a boat?

I believe Senator Phillips and Senator Marshall are concerned about this, and may wish to elaborate on the matter, but it is my understanding that up north a person can't operate a power boat more than 40 feet long without a captain's licence.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in reply to the question asked by Senator Adams, it is my understanding that if a fisherman himself is operating the boat, he does not require the so-called inshore captain's ticket. Somebody else operating the boat and carrying passengers will require the inshore ticket, as it is called. I would further point out that during the winter months the federal-provincial programs often provide courses whereby fishermen can qualify for their inshore ticket. I know a great many who have done so.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Hicks speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

[Senator Thériault.]

Senator Hicks: Honourable sentors, if I gave the impression in moving second reading of this bill that I thought it attempted to solve all the problems of the fishing industry, I certainly did very badly in my address. The bill, of course, does not make any such attempt. It provides a very limited guarantee to lending institutions to make it more likely that they will assist, to some extent, fishermen to provide themselves with equipment, including modest-sized boats—not the three quarters of a million dollar deep-sea trawlers that have been referred to by some of the previous speakers—and it does not attempt to do all the things that some provincial governments are doing to assist the fisheries in their provinces. Indeed, some of the provinces would suggest that they ought to have more authority to look after the fishing industry off their own coast and that the federal government should stay out of the matter entirely.

This is a limited piece of amending legislation which guarantees to certain lenders the loans that they may make to fishermen of modest amounts up to a maximum of $150,000.

I might deal with one or two of the points raised by Senator Phillips and, apparently, concurred in by Senator Marshall and Senator Thériault. The first had to do with the fluctuation of interest rates. This is normal lending practice, and while it is true that during the course of this bill the interest rates have generally increased, this has not always been so.

If, Senator Phillips, you had made a loan in 1970, you would have paid 8.5 per cent for your money, and the next year it would have been reduced to 7 per cent, and the next year it would have been reduced to 6.25 per cent. If you had engaged to make a loan in May of this year, you would have paid 18.5 per cent and you would have been very pleased to see it drop to 15.75 per cent in June of this year.

So this has worked both ways, although, as we all know, generally speaking, in the last 20 years the tendency of interest rates has been to increase, not at a perfectly steady linear rate but with certain fluctuations, certain ups and downs.

Senator Phillips also objected to the nature of the guarantees, saying it was not really a full guarantee. Here he was speaking, I presume, in defence of the lending institutions and not of the fishermen. The plain fact is that the bankers and—

Senator Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt you, honourable senator, but I was attempting to point out that the fisherman was not getting much of a guarantee. The banks are not going to be impressed by a 10 per cent government guarantee.

Senator Hicks: Certainly not. The guarantee is not to the fisherman; the fisherman is obliged to repay his loan the same as any other business person who gets a loan from a bank or somewhere else, but the guarantee is to the lending institution, and to some extent—

Senator Flynn: It helps the borrower.

Senator Hicks: No, the guarantee is to the lending institution; it is not to the borrower.

Senator Flynn: It is easier to borrow when you have somebody to guarantee.

Senator Phillips: Even I could borrow if I had your signatures!

Senator Hicks: You might prefer a system of subsidies. They are not dealt with in this legislation although, as previous speakers have pointed out, subsidies on fishing boats have been provided from time to time by the federal government and by some provincial governments.

This bill does not interfere with provincial schemes. It is over and above provincial lending schemes and subsidies for the construction of boats and the provision of fishing equipment.

● (1210)

Senator Phillips pointed out that the size of some of the loans had diminished. He mentioned a couple of years when this was true, but the plain fact is that the amount of the loans under this act has been steadily increasing. In the year ending in 1978, there was some $18 million in loans; in the year ending in 1979, there was some $28 million in loans; and in the year ending in 1980—the year just ended—it is estimated there will be something like $35 million loaned. So despite all the criticism that my honourable friends have voiced, the act is providing some assistance which a good many fishermen are taking advantage of.

Again, I do not suppose that fishermen can avoid the relationship with individual bank managers that every borrower and every businessmen has to have. As we all know, sometimes bank A will deal with a borrower more generously than bank B. Unless we are going to have an entirely controlled economy, I think we have to live with that situation.

I suggest, therefore, that while this is no panacea to cure all the ills that beset the fishing industry, it is a useful piece of legislation, even if it is useful in a limited way, and that it ought to receive the support of this house on second reading, which I urge.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: With leave, honourable senators, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 2.30 p.m.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before my honourable friend resumes his seat could he give us a report on the proceedings in the House of Commons with respect to the "O Canada" bill?

Senator Marshall: Are they still in tune?

Senator Frith: The information I have is that the harmony is still well tempered.

There is all-party agreement for one speaker only from each party to speak to the bill. I think the time limit for each speech is 20 minutes. The bill will go to Committee of the Whole where there will be an amendment, to be adopted without debate, respecting its effective date. The measure is to come into force upon proclamation, which will probably be on Tuesday next.

Allowing for the allotted time for each party's speaker, we should receive the bill at some time between 2.30 and 3 o'clock this afternoon. That is why I suggested we resume at 2.30 p.m. or the call of the bell. If we receive the bill earlier than that then we will ring the bell and commence our consideration at that time.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we proceed to other business, may I rise on what might be loosely regarded as a question of privilege. We have received today notices of three committee meetings scheduled for Tuesday, July 8, the committees being Banking, Trade and Commerce, Foreign Affairs, and Legal and Constitutional Affairs, all of which want to meet on the same day and at the same time.

I appeal to whomever arranges these things—and I suppose my friend Senator Lafond, who is smiling at me now, knows what I am talking about—to attempt to re-order these committees while we are in recess next week so as to avoid the necessity of honourable senators dividing themselves into three to meet the occasion.

Senator Flynn: It is even difficult to split oneself into two.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government and I yield to Senator Lafond.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin informed me of this problem just as I was coming into the chamber this afternoon. I must say, I was not aware of it at that point in time. I appreciate that Senator Roblin cannot split himself into three; even those of us who are a little more weighty than he would have a problem doing that. I shall endeavour to straighten out this situation.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. William J. Petten, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

Friday, June 27, 1980

The Committee of Selection appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several select committees during the present session makes its third report as follows:

Pursuant to the motion adopted in the Senate on Thursday, June 19, 1980, increasing the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to thirty, your committee has the honour to submit the list of additional senators nominated by it to serve on the said committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Bosa, Doody, Godfrey, Hicks, Lang, Leblanc, Molgat, Roblin, Rousseau and Smith (Colchester).

Respectfully submitted,

William J. Petten
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, July 8.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ANTHEM BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-36, respecting the national anthem of Canada.

Bill read first time.

[Senator Lafond.]

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Flynn, that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is an accepted feature of the democratic system that the Parliament of Canada has a good deal of responsibility for the establishment of national goals and the setting of national priorities. On occasion, however, there are times when Parliament in enacting a particular item of legislation is, in effect, merely giving legal and official recognition to an idea or a custom which has already gained a great measure of support across the country—the support of a large majority of Canadians for a particular view, tradition, procedure, idea, custom, or practice.

Today marks such an occasion, for Parliament is being called upon today to establish O Canada as the official national anthem of Canada. By answering this call, Parliament will be reaffirming the sense of patriotic pride and tradition embodied in this historic song, which is about 100 years old.

Senator Choquette: It is a hymn, not a song.

Senator Marshall: It is an anthem.

Senator Perrault: Our task would be far more difficult if we were being asked to choose from among several different traditional songs in order to arrive at one final choice as Canada's national anthem. But such is not the case.

[Translation]

One hundred years have gone by since Sir Adolphe Basil Routhier wrote the French words for "O Canada" and Calixa Lavallée set them so admirably to music. Similarly, it is almost 80 years since Judge Robert Stanley Weir wrote the words that were to become the most popular English version of "O Canada".

Throughout the years, "O Canada', has taken root, and vigorously in the hearts of many generations of Canadians. It has become the exceptional and precious symbol of our national identity.

[English]

The task before us is clear. We are being asked to give official recognition to the choice which our fellow Canadians made with their hearts long ago. For a nation to survive, its people must be able to attach their patriotic sentiments and affections to specific symbols of national sovereignty.

It is perhaps a tribute to the strength and the endurance of Canadians that we have survived for so long without one such symbol of nationhood as our own official national anthem. There have been, of course, a number of unofficial versions of that anthem, with one continuing melody.

Our maturity as a nation is a fact to which the vast majority of Canadians undoubtedly would attest. What better way, therefore, to give evidence to this national coming of age than adopting once and for all a truly Canadian national anthem by recognizing O Canada as a symbol of our national pride and identity.

[Translation]

We Canadians are doubtless used to considering ourselves a young people, in full development, yet, though it be true that we can claim a long and rich national tradition, it is the vigour and hope of our young people which constitute one of the most precious assets of our country. Yes indeed, that vigour and hope have enabled us to build, in just over a century, a society whose cultural diversity, tolerance, social and economic well-being are the envy of many peoples of the world.

[English]

Measured by almost any standard, Canada is especially blessed, almost singularly blessed, as a nation. Nevertheless, it is not enough that we should simply be aware of our own favoured circumstances. It is appropriate that in our own ways we should celebrate our joy and our good fortune at being Canadians. We can do that by adopting this truly Canadian anthem, which has been sung with such emotion and eloquence at so many great occasions in the history of our nation, such as a great cultural or athletic experience, a remembrance service, some event which has seen us take pride in Canadian achievement, on Canada Day far away from home, or a religious or school assembly; yes, Senator Bosa and other senators here today like Senator Rizzuto and Senator Bird, at citizenship assemblies when new Canadians from other parts of the world come here by choice to establish themselves among us as fellow citizens, and events marking entry into Confederation for those born in Newfoundland like Senator Petten, Senator Cook and Senator Marshall. Whenever this anthem has been sung, it has moved Canadians to even better endeavour and to a spirit of great loyalty to their nation. The adoption of this truly Canadian anthem represents a significant way to encourage this celebration of our national identity.

● (1500)

Throughout our history, Canadians have often been reluctant patriots. This is perhaps one of the reasons why 113 years after the founding of our nation we still do not have a formally proclaimed national anthem.

Someone once suggested that a country as wide and diverse as Canada—I think André Siegfried wrote in one of his books that there are really seven Canadas—should be governed gently and with patience, that change and reform should be accomplished carefully and taken over a period of time in recognition of the great diversity which exists here. So it has taken time to adopt this national anthem.

Has this hesitation to strongly profess our patriotism blinded us to the danger of being too timid to give voice to an honest expression of national love and commitment? If so, then surely the time has come to change our attitudes and abandon our hesitation; for if we deny ourselves the joy of recognizing and expressing our love of Canada, we risk allowing our sense of nationhood to be weakened by what are sometimes conflicting individual and regional interests and concerns. Such is a risk that we cannot afford to take.

[Translation]

On November 6, 1915, Mr. Arthur Letondal wrote in Le Devoir:

> One cannot introduce in the vocabulary a new word or impose a patriotic song on the people. There has to be the right timing, and a set of circumstances which can stir the national spirit and gain its favour.

[English]

Some 65 years after Monsieur Letondal wrote those words, and a full century after the writing of O Canada, surely it is time that this song be recognized as the official anthem of Canada.

In a nation as vigorous as Canada, with the freedom of speech which we enjoy and the right to have political differences, we may disagree politically on many matters, but is it not significant that the motion we are now debating was seconded by the Leader of the official Opposition in this chamber? In the other place there was all-party agreement that the time has come to express unanimous support for the bill which is before us today, calling for formal acceptance of our beloved anthem, O Canada.

There have been statements made that certain of the words should be changed, altered and modified, and some believe that full recognition should be given to the fact that some people were not born in Canada, that some were born in other countries. I remind honourable senators, however, that a commitment was given earlier in the debate in the other place that private members' bills calling for certain improvement in the lyrics would be brought before an appropriate committee for consideration in the next session of Parliament. The commitment was given that proposed changes would be studied, and, if so, they should surely be studied in this house as well. Perhaps there is even a case for establishing a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate so that senators will have an opportunity to express their views, and, perhaps at some time in the near future, effect those minor modifications which may make of this an even more appropriate anthem and national hymn.

Honourable senators, along with that commitment on the part of the government, to support the idea of attempting to improve this wording in the next Parliament, goes the commitment that all private members' bills on this subject in the other place will be immediately brought before a committee convened for the purpose of studying those possible changes.

With that kind of commitment, and with the assurance also that there will be Senate input into the process, I urge you to support the measure which we have before us this afternoon.

Earlier today I had copies of the proposed words for the anthem distributed to all honourable senators, who I hope will find themselves in substantial agreement with them, because they were developed by Parliament some time ago.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I seconded with tremendous pleasure and great pride the government leader's motion to pass the bill respecting our national anthem "O Canada".

This is in order that Tuesday next, in view of the change made in the other place, under which the act will be proclaimed, presumably next Tuesday July 1, when "O Canada" will be sung for the first time as Canada's official national anthem.

I must say that maybe nine Quebecers out of ten, and perhaps a very slightly lesser proportion of Canadians from other parts of the country, will be surprised that "O Canada" was not the national anthem. It has been mentioned that the French version was sung for the first time in 1880 and that Weir's version came in 1917, I understand, and this is subject to correction.

Obviously that song has become, by the very nature of things and through the evolutionary process, the true anthem that met the total perspective Canadians had of their country. There have been of course other anthems, other popular songs such as "The Maple Leaf Forever" and "O Canada mon pays mes amours" by Sir Georges Etienne Cartier. However, "O Canada" established itself quite naturally. I think we are only sanctioning the will of the people by making "O Canada" the national anthem of our great country.

At any rate, all those who have travelled—and I would say this applies to most of us, and in fact to an increasing number of Canadians today, in view of tremendously improved transportation—all those travelling outside the country and hearing "O Canada" experienced a special feeling. And at home, where the concept of Canada is being challenged, it must be acknowledged how in these circumstances people sing that anthem with fervour, enthusiasm and great nostalgia. Therefore, Parliament is only responding once more to the general expectation of the people by deciding today that Tuesday next "O Canada" will be our national anthem.

[English]

I do not want to add anything else—I do not think it is necessary—except to say that we have the good fortune of having among us someone who is the husband of a great-granddaughter of Sir Adolphe Basile Routhier, the author of the French version of O Canada. That member of the Senate is Senator Arthur Tremblay. I would, therefore, yield to him so that he may say a few words about the role played by Sir Adolphe Basile Routhier in promoting this anthem.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I thank you for this opportunity to take part in this debate—or perhaps I should say in this historic dialogue—in which the points of importance for the history of Canada, that of the textbooks, have already been made by the spokesmen for our respective parties, who moved and seconded the motion which will enable us to pass the bill now under consideration.

[Senator Perrault.]

For my part, I would have no right to take part in this historic dialogue. However, as Senator Flynn has just said, because of an association which still lasts and which will last, I suppose, until the end of our lives, I am myself related to the descendants of Sir Basil Routhier through my alliance with his great-grandaughter, Pauline Dubuc, whose mother was a Routhier.

Thanks to Senator Flynn, I can use my position as a senator to pay homage, in the context of the footnotes to history, to the families of those who wrote "O Canada," the Routhier family, the Lavallée family, and of course, the Weir family.

I would like in particular to pay homage to the grandson of Sir Basil Routhier, Adolphe Routhier, who is still living but whose ill health would not allow him to take part in today's historic events. I would like to do so by quoting a note he wrote in 1959 to Dr. Eugène Lapierre about a book that Dr. Lapierre had written on Calixa Lavallée to suggest certain modifications to the original version in view of a conversation Mr. Routhier had with his grandfather shortly before his death. This note was written in 1959, and once again, in the context of the footnotes to history, I hope it will not be considered inappropriate to put this note on the record of the Senate, the upper chamber of this country, on this historic occasion.

I shall therefore quote from this note, which might clarify certain points in the account given this morning in the other place by Mr. Fox of the events surrounding the birth of "O Canada". The note says:

> My grandfather, Sir A. B. Routhier, died at his country home in Saint-Irénée-Les-Bains around the end of June 1920.
> In May of the same year, a few weeks before his death, my grandfather recalled for me some of the events surrounding the history of what was to become later our national song "O Canada". Before writing anything, he had listened to Lavallée playing on the piano his famous melody or heroic march, on Couillard Street, in Quebec City. This melody was reminiscent of the purest Mozart, but greatly enriched by the soul of the matchless artist that Lavallée was. This was a few weeks before June 24, 1880.

There is at this point a very sentimental paragraph about the extraordinary power of recall of his grandfather written by "Uncle Adolph," over which I shall pass. He then writes:

> All four stanzas of "O Canada" were written during the night which followed the audition of the famous melody or heroic march played on the piano by Lavallée at his home on Couillard Street, in Quebec city.
>
> This is how "O Canada" came to be, but apart from Lavallée, Ernest Gagnon and my grandfather, nobody knew about it yet.
> That happened in the weeks preceding the great convention of June 24, 1880, at which time a special committee of the St. John the Baptist Society (of whom Nazaire Levasseur, Ernest Gagnon, Arthur Lavigne and others were members) had not yet been able, after quite some time—

I believe a contest had been organized to have a suitable anthem composed for the occasion——to compose or produce anything satisfactory as a song or cantata—

The word "cantata" is rather amusing.

—for the exceptional circumstance that was coming up only too soon.

The members of the committee hustled and bustled but to no avail, and Ernest Gagnon had every reason to worry that nothing tangible was in the offing.

One would almost believe this occurred in contemporary times when great achievements are at times painful in the making.

On the other hand, Ernest Gagnon, Lavallée and my grandfather found themselves in joint possession of a clandestine new-born whose coming should be announced without delay and whose fatherhood should be revealed.

The situation was particularly delicate in that my grandfather, in his capacity as general president of the convention, probably did not want to open himself to accusations of dictatorial and untimely intervention in the work of the famous special committee.

Once again, there are strange similarities between the past and the present.

The situation was also very tricky for Ernest Gagnon, who was also a member of the special committee.

Similarly, the situation could also have been very awkward for Calixa Lavallée to whom the special committee had not yet given any thought.

It was probably at that fated instant that the intervention of Lieutenant Governor Robitaille was conceived and immediately set forth.

When Lavallée received from Lieutenant Governor Robitaille the order to set the words of Routhier to music, everything had already been completed. Lavallée faithfully, and to perfection, played his role as a composer responsible for a very difficult and critical task. This led to a rebirth of "O Canada" just in time for June 24, 1880.

The intervention of Levasseur and Lavigne mentioned by Dr. Lapierre in his book on Calixa Lavallée may indeed have happened just as they said. That intervention, however, unavoidably followed the actual composition of the music and the drafting of the stanzas of "O Canada", which had to require the intervention of Lieutenant Governor Robitaille, as explained earlier.

During that talk in May 1920, my grandfather told me, incidentally, that by a lucky coincidence Ernest Gagnon had inspired almost the whole first verse of the first stanza by suggesting that the song should begin—even then it was a matter of words—with these words:

"O Canada, pays de nos aïeux".

The text became: "O Canada, terre de nos aïeux"

Ernest Gagnon said those words after his report on the above-mentioned special committee, whose activities led to nowhere.

Those words of Mr. Gagnon followed the invitation made to my grandfather to write forthwith a poem to be sung on that occasion.

My grandfather replied immediately to Mr. Gagnon that such a poem could not be written without knowing or hearing the accompanying music.

No sooner had he finished speaking than Mr. Gagnon shot back: "I have the music!. Come listen to it at Lavallée's on Couillard Street. You will hear some magnificent music."

I shall not quote anymore, now that "O Canada" has really been born.

Honourable senators, the institutional events and actions such as the one we are called upon to accomplish today are what the "great history" of a country is made of, since we are a great institution.

I thank you once again for having allowed me to introduce on this grandiose occasion some more modest material, which belongs to the footnotes of history and the uninterrupted contribution of families and generations to the common cause of building a nation and thus translating their solidarity in as significant a symbol as a national anthem.

● (1520)

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to express a few thoughts on Bill C-36, respecting the national anthem of Canada. By way of background information I would say that I was a special assistant to the government house leader in the other place in 1964 when, on a previous historical occasion, Parliament debated another important symbol, the national flag of Canada, a flag that would not be mistaken for the symbol of any other nation.

As do other honourable senators, I recall vividly that that debate lasted six months. I kept track of some of the speeches that were made—they numbered in excess of 300. At the end of that six month period, the matter was referred to a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, which met three times a day for a period of six weeks, and following the report of that committee, it seemed as though the whole debate was going to be repeated. It was at that stage that the government of the day reluctantly imposed closure. It was under those circumstances and in that manner that the flag of Canada was adopted.

I am happy that the national anthem of Canada was adopted unanimously in the other place, and it appears it is going to be adopted unanimously here. However, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not make some observations regarding the lyrics, about which I feel very strongly.

I must admit, I would have preferred that the word "native" in the first line be changed to either "cherished," or "glorious," with the line then reading:

O Canada! Our home and cherished land!

I think that would be much more reflective of the reality of the Canadian situation.

I am pleased that the Leader of the Government has assured us that the Secretary of State, the Honourable Francis Fox, has given an undertaking that this matter will be referred to a committee so as to arrive at a conclusion whereby the lyrics would be more in conformity with the reality of Canadian society.

I was on the verge earlier of moving an amendment to this bill, and it is only because I recognize the traditional and unique role that this chamber occupies in the parliamentary system—that is, that we are not here to frustrate the will of the elected house—that I shall not do so. This does not mean, however, that we have to accept holus-bolus, without voicing our strong opposition where appropriate, legislation that comes to us from the other house.

This is not the first time that something has been done as an afterthought. In fact, in the recent past we have had examples of this very thing. Honourable senators may recall that when the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission was constituted in June of 1963, its terms of reference were to look into the relationship and aspirations of the English and French communities in Canada. It was as an afterthought that the aspirations of other minority groups were added to the terms of reference.

In June of 1978 the government put out a publication entitled A Time for Action, setting out the preliminary intentions of the government with respect to constitutional amendments and stating that the Constitution would contain some form of recognition of our multicultural society. However, when Bill C-60 was tabled, it contained no reference to multiculturalism in the preamble of the Constitution as therein set out. It was again as an afterthought that the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, gave an undertaking to the members of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism that the bill would be amended to reflect that particular situation.

I hope that when this bill is adopted, all of us will stand up and sing O Canada, as they did in the other house earlier today, and I also hope that when a committee is constituted to consider amendments to the lyrics some of us will be invited to be members, so that we may present our ideas to make the national anthem of Canada more reflective of Canadian society.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I should like to add briefly to what Senator Bosa has said. I, too, would have moved an amendment to the English version of our national anthem were it not for all the good reasons that have been put forward.

[Senator Bosa.]

[Translation]

Honourable senators, Canada is my country; I love it with all my heart, I love it with a passion.

[English]

But I was not born here. Canada is not my native land. This is not a matter in which I was consulted. However, when I was of an age when consultation was possible I did come here and it is my home. I have never looked back and I shall never look back. But it is rather embarrassing to have to sing something which is not true.

• (1530)

I also feel that "true patriot love" should be commanded in all of us, and not in just the sons of this country, because I assure you, honourable senators, I am nobody's son—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bird: I am sure you can see for yourself. Therefore, I would hope that when the discussion comes up these minor items might be taken into consideration.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words. I shall be brief.

I am most happy to be here on this historic day when Canada, in a few moments, will have a national anthem. As a descendant of the first citizens of this great land, I point out that in the opening line of O Canada, which I and my people sing with vigour, there is a small reference to the Indian people—the first citizens of this great land. That line, honourable senators, is: "O Canada! Our home and native land!" That is a small reference to my people as the first citizens of Canada.

Further on there are the words: "The True North strong and free!" That is a small reference to the people of the north. I am sorry that my colleague Senator Adams is not in the chamber at the moment, because these words refer to the Inuit.

I think this is one of the greatest and proudest days that Canada will witness—the day when this great anthem becomes official.

Honourable senators, I have spoken.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have heard my colleagues indicate their special reasons for speaking. I was not involved in a committee. My grandfather knew no musicians, unless they were pipers in Prince Edward Island. I was born in this country. My ancestors came here because they had to come here as prisoners of war of the English who were unkind enough to defeat Bonnie Prince Charlie and the Macquarries a long, long time ago.

I thought, as I heard the excellent speeches today and as I looked at the clock, that there is, perhaps, something a bit Canadian about this; we say it is a very important milestone, and it is, but we have about 35 minutes in which to express ourselves.

Senator Bosa gave the opinion that the flag debate was too long. Perhaps we have gone to the other extreme. I would have been happier—and I cannot believe I am the only one here who would have been—if this chamber had perhaps had some time so that the senators, the representatives of all of the provinces, of various groups with different experiences, might have applied their thoughts and delivered their views on this historic and important occasion.

It is Canadian in that it has taken a long time. I have read some scornful reports—"What kind of country is this that would take 100 years to find its anthem?" Basically, I am not a person who thinks that procrastination is the greatest virtue; but I believe that, had this step been taken 40 years ago, 35 years ago or 25 years ago, it would not have won the ground swell of public opinion and support that it has today.

I am not saying that we needed to wait 113 years! The beautiful music was there and the inspiring words were there. Nevertheless, it took us some time to realize what in fact we should do with them.

We have been that kind of a people. As a Burke-ian, I am not upset about that. He told us long, long ago that all government, all progress, in fact every human benefit, is founded upon compromise and barter. It does not upset me that ours was not a country which, at the time of its birth, came like Pallas Athena, totally and radiantly clothed with all the attributes of shining statehood. I think our evolutionary process has worked well.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: I think it will work well, and I am very happy as a junior senator to be here on this occasion, to be for once in my life not only with the majority but perhaps with the total group in supporting a measure. I commend all the honourable senators who have spoken so well with such—I will not say passion or compassion, but with such deep feeling, because Canadians do not dare get too carried away.

I remember 1967, when it was decided to designate John A. Macdonald Day but not to celebrate it. That was a judicious Canadian compromise. We went so far, but we must not let our Canadianism show.

I think we are letting it show a bit today and I agree so much with the senator who has just resumed his seat that this is a positive and welcome development. I am happy to be with all those who have spoken, with all those who will vote, and with the whole of the people whom we represent.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to the excellent speeches we have heard. I single out one speaker in particular who has made this a personal experience for us. I refer to Senator Tremblay, who spoke to us so eloquently, bringing in his wife's great-grandfather and his contribution to the anthem. That was a fascinating aspect of our debate today, which shows some of the characteristics of the Senate, the knowledge of history and the background present here. Having a personal flavour added to the debate has made this a special occasion for me.

I am a post-war immigrant. I do not have much to distinguish myself. I wish I could talk about a grandfather who had composed any kind of music, but I am afraid that on my side of the family we are all tone deaf. I was, however, the first post-war immigrant who, having become a Canadian, was elected to the Ontario legislature, and I believe I was the first such to be appointed to the Senate. I represent, in being the first, a large flow of post-war immigrants to Canada, among whom are people far more distinguished than I, such as Senator Bosa and Senator Rizzuto and others who have come to the Senate and made a great contribution.

● (1540)

I recognize the great legacy that has been given to us and also the personal account that we have heard of the composition of our anthem, but because of the changing face of our society I agree with Senator Bosa that there should be some modification of the words. I appreciate the assurance of the Leader of the Government that the words of the anthem will be examined in committee and perhaps changed so that we all might feel a personal pride in Canada when we sing them. I thoroughly agree with the suggestions made by Senator Bosa and Senator Bird. I am sure that such amendments will be made in time.

This day has a special meaning for all of us, because Canadians can speak with their hearts and their emotions, and through the symbol of a national anthem we are given an opportunity to show our common bond, which is very strong in all of us.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on this historic and happy occasion, as we are gathered to give official sanction to our national anthem O Canada, it would be appropriate to mention that the version in Bill C-36, which we are now discussing, is the version that was recommended to Parliament by the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on February 16, 1968. One of the co-chairmen of that committee was a former Speaker of this chamber, our late colleague, the Honourable Maurice Bourget. We owe to the members of that committee our thanks for the long and difficult work that was performed to come up with the version which we are all praising today.

If honourable senators will read the 1967 and 1968 proceedings of that joint committee they will learn that one of the witnesses mentioned that there are many national anthems which have not been declared official, and that there are many national anthems which do not have official lyrics; also that lyrics of national anthems, which are considered to be less important than the melody, have changed according to historical circumstances. Therefore, we are happy that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has given us the commitment that a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons will be established in the next session of Parliament—this has been agreed to, I believe, by all the leaders in the other place—to deal with amendments or modifications to the lyrics of our national anthem, if necessary.

In the meantime, we should be proud that we have a national anthem, and we should sing it with pride and thanks, because not only is it a stirring anthem, with an interesting and fine history, but it is one that was adopted in the other place unanimously and no doubt will be similarly adopted in this house in a few moments. The comments which have been made by honourable senators should be well taken in a spirit of co-operation and understanding. We regard with pride our country and our national symbols, and we look forward with pride to giving consent in a few moments to our new official national anthem.

[Translation]

Honourable Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I am very proud to take part in this debate. I would like to congratulate those who have spoken before me and thank them for their contribution.

The Leader of the Government has already told us that the Secretary of State has undertaken to allow parliamentary committees to review at a future date the proposed version of the national anthem. I am aware of the sentiments of our fellow citizens who did not have the chance to be born in this country. Since their arrival, all of those that I know have fully shown their desire to become full-fledged Canadians. It seems to me that the few questions they are asking as to the version of the national anthem is another proof of this desire. We are therefore happy about it.

However, during the debate, when we have talked about the possibility of amending the text at some time in the future, no one has specified that it would be the English version which would be changed. I believe that it is important to put this on the record for historians and so on. I am happy to support this bill, but I do so with the following qualification: As long as I live, I shall never authorize anyone, even a parliamentary committee, to tamper with the French version which has existed—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lafond: —which has existed for one hundred years and which I myself, and my father and grandfather before me, learned at school and which we have been singing for a hundred years.

[English]

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I belong to a large group of statutory Canadians, and if I remain silent it may be thought that I have some objection to the proposed words. All Newfoundlanders, however, honourable senators, are great believers in poetic licence, and, therefore, I am sure we will be able to sing the proposed words with a happy heart.

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, as you know, I am among those who would feel excluded if I were to sing the national anthem as proposed in the English version. I therefore understand the feelings of honourable senators who say that they would be willing to make appropriate changes by establishing a committee in the near future. I believe that we should not be in any hurry to pass such an important bill about which we have been talking for 100 years, while promising to change it in two or three months.

For my part, I do not agree with the words "native", and I should say that I am rather uneasy about this! On the other hand, I would not want to force anything on the majority of Canadians, but there are hundreds of thousands like myself in Canada who are in the same situation. We have chosen Canada. We came here and applied for citizenship, and we became Canadian citizens. We would like to be able to sing the national anthem like anyone else and to feel ourselves fully Canadian. To do this and to make this possible for everyone, it is obvious that the words should be changed, as suggested by Senator Bosa. What I am wondering is why we should not wait a week, or ten days if need be, and refer the bill to a committee, or else refer the bill to a committee this afternoon to make the necessary changes and come back Monday to pass a bill which would please everyone, because we cannot ask the Canadian people to change the words of the national anthem once it has been adopted. If we want to make any changes, we should do so right now.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I do not plan to add anything to what has already been said very eloquently this afternoon—

• (1550)

[English]

At this stage I should like to correct the record so far as it concerns the remark made by Senator Bosa a few moments ago that the terms of reference of the B and B Commission had to be changed to refer to Canadians of more recent origin. I can tell you that I was the author of those terms of reference and that they included, from the start, this reference to Canadians of more recent origin in addition to the two founding peoples. From the very start we expressed our intention to appoint two distinguished Canadians of more recent origin to the commission.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, as a foreigner—

An Hon. Senator: Explain.

Senator Muir: Explain? After what has been said, I can understand that remark. I was not fortunate enough to be born in this country. I was born in "Auld Reekie," Edinburgh, Scotland, and as Senator Macquarrie has said, they did not appreciate good talent over there at times so they kicked us out and raised sheep.

In any event, if we look around this chamber we will find people whose ancestors are from all over the world. Indeed, the only person here who can claim Canada as his native land is Senator Williams. I do believe, honourable senators, that we are doing a wee bit of nit-picking in playing around with this word and that word. I am not ashamed to sing "Our home and native land." I adopted this country as my native land, and I am proud of Canada. I would hope that we are all Canadians regardless of our origins, and that we still retain our cultures. This is the wonderful thing about this country. My goodness, there is nothing greater than watching Ukrainian or French folk dancing. In fact, when they are playing the fiddles and violins in Quebec, it reminds me of the Scots.

Why can we not all accept that we are Canadians? Whatever their origins in the United States they all say, "I am proud I am an American." We should all be proud we are Canadians. We are Canadians first, last and always, and we live in a country where we can retain the best of what has been brought here from all parts of the world.

What a great country Canada is. Let us all be proud of it. There may be some slight changes to be made, but let us not say, "I am ashamed to say, 'my native land' ". I am not. I adopted this country. I am proud of this country. I wouldn't live anywhere else. I wouldn't have any part of any other country. We can still retain what has been brought here from Italy and all those other great countries.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to join with other senators who said they would not want to change—

[Translation]

—because, I too am proud of the French version. I would not have one word changed in that version, because my ancestors go back, through wedlock, to Quebec and Lévis, to the year 1652. I believe they were in Canada even earlier than that.

I would also like to say that I have always sung "O Canada", either in French or in English, with pride and enthusiasm. I can assure you that once we have passed this bill my pride and enthusiasm in singing it will be just as great.

It seems to me, as the honourable senator pointed out a while ago, that I have always felt that enthusiasm and that pride, ever since I first sang it when I was young; I would not like to see it changed.

Moreover, the bill we pass today, honourable senators, will in no way alter the respect I have always felt for our national anthem.

[English]

As far as the English language is concerned, I am saying O Canada in both languages. I am as proud as Senator Williams to sing, "Our home and native land!". I am proud to sing our national anthem in either language. The enthusiasm with which I have sung it will be passed on to future generations, just as my family passed it on to me in the past. I do not think that the words as some have suggested, will change that enthusiasm. I did say that I would like to keep the French version, as has been mentioned, and I reserve my right to that end on the French version.

Honourable senators, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to mention this.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Perrault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, one or two questions have been raised during the course of this very interesting and, indeed, inspiring debate. The question of possible changes in the future has been raised.

May I say that in June of 1967 a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons was formed and given a mandate to study the question of the national anthem of Canada. This committee, as has been mentioned briefly in this debate, issued its report in February 1968 and unanimously recommended that the government immediately adopt O Canada as the national anthem of our country. The committee recommended that the slightly modified version of Judge Robert Stanley Weir's English text, and the original of Sir Adolphe Basile Routhier's French text, be adopted together with the music of Lavallée. This is the version that we have before us in the Senate this afternoon.

A number of senators—and, I think, with good reason—have suggested that perhaps modifications should be made in the ultimate form of the lyrics. Some members of both houses believe there should be changes in the version unanimously recommended by the 1968 joint committee of both houses. Certain members of the opposition, and indeed supporters of the government, both here and in the other place, believe that certain word changes should be considered. Some have suggested, that the words "sons" and "native land" be replaced. In the case of the words "native land," it has been suggested that they be changed to "cherished land", to better reflect the reality of Canada.

● (1600)

It should be said, however, that there are members of the Senate and the House of Commons who, in addition to their parliamentary skills, believe they have been endowed with the gift of musical composition and the ability to write lyrics. I understand that a number of proposals for even more drastic change in wording have been advanced by members of the other place. The process of parliamentary consideration of all of these creative variations would have delayed substantially the adoption of what, in the main, is a version satisfactory to all Canadians. The version of the anthem before us is the product of the demonstrated Canadian capacity to achieve a compromise.

I want to assure honourable senators that in the course of the next session the government will be more than willing to have considered proposals for word changes which may come forward in the form of a private members' bills. Such bills in both houses will be welcomed. Furthermore, I suggest that perhaps a joint committee should be designated to consider further word change proposals.

In view of the fact that we are so close to virtual unanimity on this version, with only one or two words in question, I feel that we should march forward together and adopt the anthem as it appears before us. As was said in the other place the other day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when speaking in terms of developing a broad view of the entire nation, stated:

> To those, sir, who have life before them, let my prayer be this: Remember from this day forth never to look simply at the horizon as it may be limited by the limits of the Province, but look abroad over all the continent—

Let us not get caught up too much on whether one word should be changed or altered, or get caught up on nuances of the word

"native"—a word open to several interpretations. Let us take a broad look at the future of our country and vote for this bill.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am making a considerable effort to refrain from making a speech, and I shall therefore read the motion.

[English]

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Sentor Flynn, P.C., that this bill be now read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., that this bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would ask that the music and lyrics of our national anthem be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the music and lyrics of O Canada, as they are found in Bill C-36, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For Appendix see p. 567)

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I now ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to lead us in the singing of O Canada?

Senator Frith: I just happen to have my music with me.

Whereupon honourable senators rose and sang O Canada.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 8, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at 4.40 p.m., or perhaps earlier.

It is expected that a number of private members' bills changing names of constituencies will be passed by the other place this afternoon. If we receive those bills in the next short while, we may ring the bell and ask honourable senators to consent to first, second and third readings today. The bills are receiving similar treatment in the other house. Of course, I do not insist, and leave might not be granted. There is no particular urgency, but if we are going to be here anyway, it might be an appropriate use of our time to deal with those bills, in which event they, too, could receive royal assent this afternoon.

So, if the bell does ring some time before the expected arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, it will probably be for that purpose.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, so that the deputy leader will not be surprised, may I tell him now that leave will not be granted?

Senator Frith: Yes, the honourable senator may tell me now that leave will not be granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that leave is granted?

Senator Frith: No, Mr. Speaker. I was not at this time asking for leave. I was merely indicating that I may later be requesting leave for these 13-odd bills to be given first, second and third readings this afternoon. However, assuming there is no way of having Senator Lafond otherwise engaged at that time, it appears that we will not be getting leave even if the bills do come before us.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILLS TO AMEND—FIRST READINGS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the the House of Commons with Bill C-268, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint Hyacinthe-Bagot); Bill C-402, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sarnia-Lambton); Bill C-488, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Rimouski-Temiscouata); Bill C-529, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington); Bill C-565, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Notre Dame de Grâce-Lachine East); Bill C-599, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Berthier Maskinongé-Lanaudière); Bill C-600, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Cochrane-Superior); Bill C-601, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Argenteuil-Papineau); Bill C-602, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Verdun-Saint Paul); Bill C-604, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Sainte Marie); Bill C-605, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Mercier); Bill C-606, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Richmond-Wolfe); Bill C-608, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montmorency-Orléans); and Bill C-609, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (La Prairie).

The Clerk of the Senate: Bill C-268, an act to change the name of the electorial district of Saint-Hyacinthe; Bill C-402—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Bills read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am reluctant to give leave. After all, we have not even heard the titles of these bills read out in this house, let alone had an opportunity to read the bills themselves. They may be the most innocuous and routine measures that could be imagined, but it seems to me that it would be quite irresponsible for us to take that for granted, and I for one would suggest that this house would do well to at least read the bills before proceeding further.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Lafond certainly gave my learned friend, the deputy leader on the other side, an opportunity to fire off a stinging salvo. The reason I asked for consent to dispense with the reading of the list was that we all knew very well that Senator Lafond was not going to give consent. However, I don't begrudge that suggestion, but I do want to make it clear on the record that there would have been no intention of giving the bills three readings in this chamber without even going through the titles. A votre place, j'en ferais autant.

Therefore, since leave is not granted—and that seems to be the consensus—I move that the bills be placed on the order paper for second reading on Wednesday, July 9 next.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, seeing that reference was made to me, I think I shoud have an opportunity now to reply.

First, I should say to the house leader that I am not his learned friend. I am his friend, but I am not his learned friend. Those adjectives are applied to those members of the Senate who are barristers or solicitors, and as I am a university drop-out I do not think I can claim any consideration from my honourable friend—who is my honourable and learned friend—in this respect at all.

The second thing I have to say—and I want this to be quite clear—is that while I respect the comments of Senator Lafond, I by no means, consider that that inhibited me from making my views known, and I want to assure my honourable friend, the deputy leader, that had Senator Lafond risen before me, I would still have made the same comment that I made just now.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was referring only to the fact that there was a suggestion that we would want to proceed with these bills without even reading the titles. My comment related only to the suggestion that we ought not to dispense with that.

Senator Roblin: You asked for leave, and what did you ask leave for but to proceed?

Senator Frith: Well, we could read them all on second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this is turning out to be more fun than I thought. The reason why I have moved that these bills be read the second time on July 9 is that, since there is no leave, two sitting days' notice is required.

Senator Roblin: That is correct.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there is no business before the house, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

> Honourable members of the Senate:
> Members of the House of Commons:
>
> I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk of the Senate.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act respecting the national anthem of Canada.
>
> An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.
> An Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

An Act to amend an Act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and to amend an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal.

An Act to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers.

An Act to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

An Act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 8, at 8 p.m.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 8, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE DONALD SMITH

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators may be aware of the fact that a long-time colleague and a great friend of all of us, the Honourable Senator Donald Smith, retired from the Senate yesterday.

Senator Smith was born in the great province of Nova Scotia. He had a distinguished parliamentary career before he was named to the Senate in 1955. He was an outstanding member of the other place; he came here in 1955 and rendered outstanding and distinguished service in this house. He served in many capacities and was a member of several Senate committees. During the course of his service in the Senate, honourable senators may recall that among his many responsibilities he rendered invaluable service as the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

By profession, Senator Smith is a Doctor of Dental Surgery, and I would say that, in terms of his deportment in this house and the manner in which he conducted himself with respect to all affairs relating to Parliament, he was a great credit to the Senate. I think we all agree that the news of his resignation yesterday came as a great disappointment to his colleagues and all who knew him. However, we do wish him well in his retirement. Undoubtedly, this able person will be active in many areas of endeavour. Certainly his resignation deserves to be marked by all of us.

● (2005)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I join the Leader of the Government in paying tribute to Senator Donald Smith who resigned from the Senate yesterday on reaching his seventy-fifth birthday. It is a pity, because he is an affable, congenial partisan. Nova Scotia seems to have spawned a lot of those. He was one who, because he never minced his words, and always made his position clear, was a pleasure to listen to.

He served in the House of Commons and in the Senate for over 30 years. I believe he came to the Senate in 1955.

The people of Queens-Shelburne had, as their spokesman in Parliament, an able, articulate and dedicated gentleman, one who gave of himself unstintingly, and one who made an effort to understand. He served his country well. The people of Nova Scotia have reason to be proud and thankful—proud of the significant contribution made by one of their native sons, and thankful that he offered to represent them in Parliament.

We on this side wish Senator Smith a splendid retirement. May he enjoy increasingly good health and the opportunity for as much physical and cerebral activity as may be required to keep him happy and content.

● (2010)

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted to add a word or two. There are two Doctors of Dental Surgery in the Senate, and both are graduates of the Dalhousie dental school—the Honourable Senator Orville Phillips and the Honourable Senator Donald Smith, about whom we are talking this evening.

Senator Smith has been a long-standing close friend of mine. Some political leaders, when they were chosen to become leaders of their party, can claim there was an overwhelming surge of support for them and people everywhere demanded that they throw their hats in the ring, but when I sought the leadership of the Liberal Party in Nova Scotia in 1954 this was not the case. Indeed, there were only a half a dozen people who thought I should seek the leadership, one of whom was Donald Smith, then a member of the House of Commons. I cannot help but commend him for his good judgment on that occasion! However, he may have made a mistake because I did not survive very long.

Seriously, Donald Smith has been a public-spirited citizen, doing more than his share for a great many years. It is too bad that failing health has finally prevailed upon him to tender his resignation from the Senate. We all appreciate the contribution that he has made, and I join with the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in expressing the hope that his years of retirement will see an improvement in his health and a pleasurable life for many years to come.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to join for a moment or two in expressing appreciation for the great service of Senator Smith, and I, of course, join in the good wishes for his retirement years which have already been expressed.

I knew Senator Smith well many years ago when he was active in politics in a different way. It should be mentioned that before he went into federal politics, he was active at the local level, having been a member of the Council of the Town of Liverpool, as well as being a member of many other organizations, all of which entailed a great deal of useful service to his community and to that portion of the province in which he lived.

After I came to the Senate—and by that time he had been here many years—I found him to be a friendly and congenial companion, both in activities in the Senate and in travelling back and forth from the capital of our country to Nova Scotia. I deeply regret that he has found it necessary to leave this body, and I join most warmly in the good wishes for his future that have been already so well expressed.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words in honour of Senator Smith. On the occasion of my being sworn in as a member of this house, Senator Smith, at my request, escorted me into the chamber. Our friendship dates back to 1924, when we were at Mount Allison University together. It has been a long friendship, and I have always cherished his advice in connection with my duties in the Senate. He is a knowledgeable person, a leader, and one who is always willing to help. While I knew it was inevitable, I was shocked to learn of his resignation. I wish him all the best in his retirement.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, again I speak as a baby in this house, but I can say to you that I have known Senator Smith for a long time, and have admired him for all of that time. I am not praising him just because he is a graduate of Mount Allison University, of which illustrious institution I am an Honorary Professor of Political Science, which gives me the maximum of glory, the minimum of work, and absolutely no reward financially. But Mount Allison admires him and I admire him.

• (2015)

I can say of Senator Smith, and I have known him for a long time at parliamentary gatherings, what one great English scholar wrote to another—it is not easy for a Highland Scot to bring to bear an Englishman—"He was never mean or little in his disputes." He was a partisan, but he was more than a partisan. He was a great Canadian. I admire him and I wish him the very best in what I hope will be the many years before him.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, Don Smith and I came to the House of Commons together and we came to the Senate together. For a while we were seatmates in the House of Commons. In his quiet way he had great capacity, understanding and ability. When he came here he continued with his work, although his health was not good. He gave excellent service, and his influence was considerable. He is one of those maritimers who make a most valuable contribution. That is Don Smith.

My friendship with him continued, and we corresponded with each other regularly after it became impossible for him to come here regularly. He is an unusually pleasant and able man, and the country has benefited from the many years of service that he gave. I join with all honourable senators in wishing him and his family the very best.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I too would like to pay a brief tribute to the Honourable Donald Smith. I had the pleasure of saying a few words about him the other evening at a testimonial dinner given in his honour.

Donald Smith is a good friend of mine. When I came to the Senate he was instrumental in showing me around, and in a number of ways he made my life here easier. He represented the area from which he came more than adequately, and while I join in what has been said by those who have risen here tonight, I would add that Donald Smith will be sorely missed by the people of the riding from which he came because he was both a friend and a person in Ottawa whom they could approach to do for them the things they wanted done.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would like to join my colleagues who have preceded me in paying tribute to Senator Donald Smith. He can best be described as one of God's Christian gentlemen. When I first took my seat in this august chamber, Don was one of the people who was most helpful and considerate to the new boy.

He was, until the recent past, when his health prevented it, a most faithful attender in this chamber and the various committees on which he served. As chairman of the Internal Economy Committee and acting whip and deputy leader he was a credit to his province and to his country. We will all miss him. I wish him well in his retirement.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is it still the position of the government, as stated many times previously by the minister, that approval will not be given for the prebuild section of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline until the government has absolute assurances that the entire line will be constructed? Those were the words of the minister on May 13. On June 18 he stated that there was no point in one country going ahead with pipeline construction to the border when the other country is unable to give assurance that its section will be built. On June 19 he stated that the conditions with respect to the exchange of assurances between the two countries would have to be met before a construction permit is issued. On June 26 he further stated that the prebuild did not stand alone as a means of exporting Canadian gas. I should like to know the government's position.

● (2030)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I believe the reply to the question that the honourable senator has just finished reading states the government's position.

I do not want to offer any information that has not been asked for, but I will do so once more. In the last two weeks or so, very significant progress has been made towards meeting those conditions.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT TO PRESS BY CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have now posed this question three times and have exhausted my terminology of the Anglican Church since I am a member of that great Christian community of Presbyterians. However, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government for the fourth time, following my question of May 14, which is a long time ago, whether he has discovered what the Canadian ambassador to the United Nations did say. It seems to me and to members of the press that what he said was a reflection upon the former government.

Can the leader advise me whether he has ascertained what the ambassador said because, if the Canadian government cannot discover what their own ambassador is saying, then what, in the name of God, is the international community thinking of Canadian diplomacy?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a result of diligent research, I have come into possession of a statement with respect to the remarks allegedly made by the distinguished ambassador.

I can assure honourable senators that it was most certainly not Ambassador Dupuy's intention in his press conference to imply in any way that the policies of the former government were unsound. He is a senior civil servant who has loyally served both Liberal and Conservative governments over more than 25 years. If this unfortunate impression was gained, it was an inadvertent result of the manner in which the one hour's briefing was summarized and telescoped in the short news report quoted by the senator. Ambassador Dupuy simply said that the foreign policy review was not being pursued at this stage.

It is, in the government's view, entirely appropriate that after being returned to office it should continue policies which have proved sound in the past, and equally appropriate, honourable senators, that a senior civil servant should publicly express support for his government's policies. To state this, however, does not imply in any way that different policies of the former government were unsound.

As Mr. Dupuy's press conference was an informal gathering, no transcript was retained by the government.

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the leader for his full reply after a three-week period, and I congratulate him on that. However, can he indicate what the ambassador really meant when he said that the government is now pursuing sound policies? From that one would think that previously the government had been pursuing policies which were not sound, and that strikes me as an inappropriate comment for an ambassador to make.

I notice my bearded friend from the prairies shaking his head, and I must say I love the diversion, but could the leader make available to this chamber a full statement of what our honoured ambassador did, in fact, say to the press in New York?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I repeat that this was a friendly, informal gathering. No transcript was retained by the government and, frankly, honourable senators, I felt the statement I gave might have brought some comfort to Senator Macquarrie because it certainly did not constitute a criticism of the previous government. Indeed, let me repeat those words to state that this does not imply that different policies of the former government were unsound.

● (2035)

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have never yet pursued a question to the third stage. I usually stop at the first stage. Would my very good friend, who is so well trained in Anglicanism and political—

Senator Flynn: Liberalism.

Senator Macquarrie: No, I would say political dexterity. I admire him for that. Would he be prepared to put before this house, or a committee thereof, the full record of what our honourable ambassador did in fact say, because, as I mentioned to him at my second time of inquiry, the United Nations has very good recording facilities and can, I think, reproduce every word uttered there. I am sure that the minister knows that we of this Senate would make the appropriate, decent and honourable judgment. I would like him to make that available to us.

Senator Perrault: Senator Macquarrie makes reference to the honourable ambassador. Indeed, he is an honourable man. There appear to be no recordings available of the press conference which, as I have stated, was informal. There are no tapings available, and this finding is as a result of efforts to locate a transcript or recording of the press conference.

Senator Olson: Quit the witch-hunt, anyway.

Senator Macquarrie: Who suggested a witch-hunt? I rise on a question of privilege. I think the bearded member of the cabinet suggested witch-hunting. I will not defer to him in my internationalism. I am interested in knowing what our ambassador is saying abroad, and I have no intention to defer to him in my regard for this particular ambassador. I want him cleared fully, and I do not think this is clearing him fully. I want exactly the words that he said, and this Senate deserves no less.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development if he has an answer to a question I asked him on June 19. The question had to do with the continuance of the 20 per cent government subsidy for the shipbuilding industry. Could the minister answer the question now? I am sure that he has a positive reply.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I thought the information requested was included in the delayed answers that I am prepared to give this evening, but apparently it is not here. I will make sure that the answer is given tomorrow.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and, if it gives him any comfort to know it, I am proposing to read some notes in connection with it.

I understand that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in the other place today that the federal government is reviewing the recent discussions between himself and the energy ministers of the producing provinces. I believe this to be a direct quotation, or very close to it: "If it becomes clear that improvements are possible in the federal offer, then a new package could be presented to Premier Lougheed by the Prime Minister." That leads me to wonder whether it is really possible that this government could be contemplating such a crucial conference, knowing that the negotiations referred to have not proceeded very well, with nothing more in their hands to further the negotiations.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is well known that this government had given a commitment and that it would negotiate with the producing provinces, especially Alberta, in good faith. I think that has been done. We are sincerely attempting to reach a negotiated settlement. We tried to have that completed by July 1 when there was some indication on both sides—it was more than an indication—that the oil producing agreement had terminated. We now have 30 days more by agreement, and certainly it is our very sincere hope that a negotiated settlement can be reached by then.

The honourable senator, of course, is asking for more than that. He is asking me now to reveal what has been part of those negotiations and what additional matters might have been put up. I could repeat the answers that my predecessors gave day after day after day last November and December. You do not frustrate the negotiations by revealing their contents until the negotiations are concluded.

Senator Smith: I can only say that the honourable gentleman could not have been listening very carefully to what I was reading. I was not asking him to reveal the contents of any negotiations except in the particular way in which the question was phrased. I do not pretend to repeat myself now, but this was the sum and substance of the question: Is it really possible that the Government of Canada in such crucial negotiations now contemplates meeting the representatives of the producing provinces, and particularly meeting the Premier of Alberta, with no new inducements or indications in their hands that would further the negotiations?

● (2040)

Senator Olson: That is another way of asking the question probably in more general terms than I indicated. As far as I can see, it is exactly the same question that I said I was not going to answer, because I think it is improper to do so. What the honourable senator is asking is if there is going to be more put on the table, and I would expect that that is another way of doing what a lot of people try to do with cabinet ministers if they cannot find out what happened in a cabinet discussion; they will ask about a lot of other things, such as whether it was on the agenda and so on. I do not propose to be sucked one inch into that kind of trap.

Senator Smith: The honourable minister has a stock answer to every question. I am not sure if he will be able to divulge whether or not there was a thunderstorm this afternoon without resorting to this circumlocution in answer.

Senator Flynn: He doesn't know.

Senator Smith: It leads me to wonder something further. I believe that in his answer the minister referred to an agreement with reference to pricing which had expired, but which I understand has been extended to July 31. I understand further he is indicating that no more meetings are expected until the meeting of July 24. I now ask him: Is it really possible that the Government of Canada contemplates being able to reach an agreement by July 31 if no further meeting is to be held until July 24, in one week?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I don't want to repeat the commitments that this government has made and maintained through many, many weeks of negotiation, which is that we sincerely intend to try to reach a negotiated solution, and of course an agreement. I am an optimist in this, I think. I never cease to believe that reasoned agreement can be reached by reasonable men in a reasonable discussion.

Senator Smith: I should think that is probably right. I am trying to find out if one side is going to be reasonable.

Senator Olson: That you can take for certain.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER—EXPORT TAX

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. At the recent Liberal Party convention in Winnipeg, I understand that a resolution was passed to the effect that no export tax would be applied to natural gas sales. Will that same policy be applied to the export of hydro-electric power?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I know of no such resolution having been passed in Winnipeg.

Senator Flynn: Were you there?

Senator Olson: Yes, I was there.

Senator Perrault: He certainly was.

Senator Asselin: Can you say that no statement at all has been made in this regard by the minister?

Senator Olson: No, I cannot say that no statement has ever been made. I can say that I did not hear it. However, that is not the reply I made. Senator Doody said that some resolution had been passed that there be no export tax on gas. I don't know that that resolution was passed. It might have been when I was not at the meeting. I expect to get a full report of all the resolutions that were passed in a very few days.

Senator Doody: I have a copy of the resolution here, if that would be helpful to the minister, but perhaps he would prefer to wait until he gets the report.

Senator Olson: It is nice to have a copy of the resolution, but I would like to have the evidence that it was debated in the proper way and passed.

Senator Asselin: We weren't invited.

Senator Olson: I think I would rather rely on those rapporteurs from those meetings than some hearsay evidence that the honourable senator brings here.

Senator Flynn: Whether it was properly debated or not.

Senator Doody: I have read words to the effect that there was very little participation by the rank and file, but I guess it extended to the top echelons as well. I will just have to wait until the minister is ready to reply.

THE CABINET

PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government arising out of the announcement by the Prime Minister today that he has no objection to making public the information as to the membership of cabinet committees. I wonder whether the minister and his colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development, who have been stonewalling this chamber so shamelessly on this subject for the past number of months—

Senator Olson: You have destroyed the question by a long preamble.

Senator Murray: Are they now prepared, in the same spirit of freedom of information, to say whether they have seen the light as of 2 o'clock this afternoon and are now prepared to divulge this highly sensitive information to this chamber?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): First of all, I do not believe that anyone on this side ever suggested that this was a highly sensitive matter.

Senator Roblin: He just doesn't answer the question.

Senator Perrault: It was suggested that the proposal was under consideration whether the composition of these cabinet committees would be made public. I have looked at a transcript of the comments of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the other chamber this afternoon. If he proceeds to make public the make-up of the committees I can see no objection to having the same information tabled in this place. However, we must await events as they occur in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Really? You will do that? That is nice.

AGRICULTURE

MANITOBA—DROUGHT RELIEF

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with drought relief in Manitoba. My first question to him is if he will tell me whether or not the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Employment and Immigration, is the authorized spokesman for the government in respect to matters connected with drought relief.

Senator Perrault: He is a great minister.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I am not sure that Mr. Axworthy is the authorized spokesman for drought relief. He is the authorized spokesman for Manitoba, and I would wish to know what he said about this particular question before I comment on it. I think Mr. Axworthy can handle himself. He speaks very well whenever he speaks.

Senator Roblin: I call that damnation by faint praise, and very well done too. I congratulate the minister on his perspicacity.

Senator Argue: I think he is exceedingly able.

Senator Roblin: The point that brought me to my feet has to do with the statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration in Winnipeg on July 4, in which he said, referring to the federal program, that there was nothing in there to help pay any portion of Manitoba's emergency feed and transportation program. He said there was nothing in there. Then he went on to say—and this particularly concerns me—

Senator Perrault: A newspaper report.

Senator Roblin: Well, these are in quotation marks, so I presume they are correct. If not, we can establish the facts, because I wouldn't wish to put any words in his mouth.

Senator Smith: It is full of them anyway.

Senator Walker: He is going to choke.

Senator Roblin: Referring to Mr. Downey, who is the Minister of Agriculture in Manitoba, he said:

> He made an announcement without consulting with the federal government about federal participation.

He went on in the same interview, I suppose, or perhaps in another one, to say:

> It is unfortunate there was no consultation by the provinces with the federal government beforehand. I don't have to explain to you how government works.

I will reserve any comment on the cynicism of that final sentence, but I will say that I am disturbed to see it printed as coming from the minister, because I have had pretty fair assurances, which I must say relieved my mind on the matter, both from the minister to whom I am addressing these remarks and also from the Minister of State for Economic Development. Both of those gentlemen gave me repeated assurances that they were in contact with the governments in the prairie provinces; that there had been consultation in all respects, and in particular reference to the program that the Government of Manitoba announced I think both ministers can fairly be said to have given assurance that the fact that the Government of Manitoba took the action it did had not ruled them out in any way from receiving support from the federal government.

• (2050)

On May 27, I made the following statement:

> It seems to me that if a meeting were held between the three provincial Ministers of Agriculture and the federal officials, such a meeting would go a long way towards ensuring that we had the maximum effect for the minimum of effort in relieving the distress to which my honourable friend referred.

Senator Olson replied:

> My honourable friend can take it that exactly what he is describing that ought to be done now has been going on for many days.

I thought that was a good statement.

Then, on May 29 I asked the following question:

> I have a final supplementary question. The minister has said that he thinks the provinces will go along with the federal government's relief policy. The provinces have their own policies. What is the attitude of the federal government with respect to those policies? Could the minister give us a statement on that?

The minister replied:

> Having had discussions with my colleagues, I can say that I am positive that the federal government will agree in principle with the policies that have been put forth by the provincial government. It is simply a matter of co-ordination. I honestly do not anticipate difficulty in any way whatsoever.

Then I followed with the following question, which really was the final question:

> Will money follow the agreement in principle?

The Honourable Senator Argue answered "Yes." I can give you another example of a question I put to one of the two honourable gentlemen. This time, I guess, it was Senator Argue still speaking. Referring to me he said—

Senator Argue: Was it I?

Senator Roblin: Yes. The reference is June 17, page 476. The passage reads:

> The honourable senator asked whether in this program, in addition to the sharing of costs involved in the moving of feed to livestock, there should be a provision for payment for the movement of cattle to pasture. That provision is in the program. The federal government is prepared to share those costs.
> With regard to the agreements—and here I do not want to put up any barriers, because there are none—they will need to be signed by both the federal and provincial governments. I have seen draft copies of the agreements. The Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, in a telephone conversation with me, said that he felt the points were satisfactory.

So it seemed that the minister was well in touch.

After the fact—after the statement made by the Manitoba government—on June 25, the Honourable Senator Olson said this:

> The fact that Manitoba has made an announcement in advance of having a prior financial commitment by the federal government in no way jeopardizes the possibility of asking—

And I realize how carefully he worded his reply:

> —the possibility of asking the federal government to participate—

From those statements I got the impression that there was a good co-ordination, a good liaison with the provincial governments, and that the federal government was giving sympathetic consideration to the request. I hope that is still the case. I have been given no reason by the ministers opposite not to think that it is still the case, and I hope that it is. If it is, I wonder if they would correct the statements made by their colleague, which seems to me to be far from the spirit of co-operative federalism.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, in the statement I made on May 29 I talked about and referred to the federal program that had been announced up until that time. Any notes I had seen about a possible agreement were draft notes, and I saw no difficulty in an agreement about certain transportation costs that Ottawa would share within that program of $7 million, which was made light of and which was ridiculed.

I knew nothing on May 29, nor at a later date, about any possible $40 million drought plan which was to be unveiled by the Premier of Manitoba. I did not know that the Premier of Manitoba had any consultation—any prior consultation—with any member of the federal cabinet about that program. I do know, however, that the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba was in Regina on the Sunday preceding the announcement asking federal officials for their opinion as to what might be inserted in a program. He was getting their technical advice.

In any event, on Monday, June 24, Premier Lyon unveiled a $40 million Manitoba drought relief program. A certain spokesman for the Conservative Party—I cannot quote what was said because I don't have the press clippings right at hand—was pretty critical and said that the federal government was not very co-operative and was not doing very much about the situation. It did seem a little strange to me that with no consultation—and that is as far as I know—between the Premier of Manitoba or any minister of the Manitoba government and any minister of the federal government, which discussions might have led to this kind of an announcement on the basis of a joint plan, the Premier of Manitoba would ask the federal government to pay for a large share of his plan. I do know that after the statement was made, instructions were issued by the Premier of Manitoba to the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, Mr. James Downey, asking him to go to Ottawa the next morning to interview Mr. Whelan and ask the federal government to pay half the cost or close to half of the cost.

There is great room in this country for discussion and for co-operation, and perhaps even for agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments, but I do not see how it is likely to result in a satisfactory agreement if one party—this time I believe the Province of Manitoba—announces a large plan without having had prior consultation and yet wants to send the federal government a bill for close to half of the cost.

We announced at a later date a specific federal drought program and a specific one directed toward herd maintenance, with some other details, in the amount of $60 million. The federal government did not ask the Province of Manitoba to share in that cost.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I should like to ask the minister if he would please obtain more facts on this situation for the house, because my information varies somewhat from what he has told us.

My information is that the deputy ministers from the two Departments of Agriculture met in May and that the program was outlined to them at that time. My information is that the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba telexed the federal Minister of Agriculture on the Friday before the announcement was made in Manitoba. I also am informed that—

Senator Argue: Would you have the contents of that telex?

Senator Roblin: I was going to ask you for that.

Senator Argue: I don't have it. It was for the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Roblin: When the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba met with the federal Minister of Agriculture, the latter is reported to have said that it was a good program and that they would work with them on it. That is the information I have.

My question is: Will the minister be kind enough to table in the Senate the documents that may have passed between the deputy ministers or the ministers with respect to this matter so that we can ascertain the facts of the situation?

Senator Argue: I am certainly prepared to make those inquiries of the ministers involved in the other place. I presume they themselves will decide on what information may be given to me to supply to the Senate and to my honourable friend. However, I certainly will endeavour to have that done.

• (2100)

As to a meeting of deputy ministers dealing with this subject at an earlier date in which a deputy minister from Manitoba was involved, I cannot say; but it was alleged by the Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan that there was a meeting of officials at the deputy minister level, meaning officials from the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture—I believe a deputy minister—in Ottawa with federal officials at which a certain agreement was reached. I saw a copy of the letter that the federal Minister of Agriculture wrote to the Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan, and in that letter he stated that at that particular meeting—and I would think that was the very first meeting that was held at that level—not only was there no agreement arrived at but the question of an agreement was not even considered; that the meeting discussed the problem, with no reference to an agreement. But, assuming that is the same meeting, I will certainly endeavour to get the position of the federal Minister of Agriculture on that subject.

Senator Roblin: I am sure that the matter of the communications with the Government of Saskatchewan is of interest, but my main concern is the relationship with the Government of Manitoba. My honourable friend left me in some doubt as to what he proposes to produce by way of papers. He made reference to the ministers of the other place. Did he mean the Government of Manitoba or—

Senator Argue: I think there is only one "other place" from our standpoint.

Senator Roblin: Yes, but it seems to me that if a request for papers is made in this house, we do not necessarily have to be guided by what happens in the other house. We can make our requests here, and the minister can then make up his mind as to whether or not he is going to let us have them.

Senator Argue: All I was endeavouring to say was that I would take the request of Senator Roblin to the federal Minister of Agriculture and point out to him the request that has been made and then bring to this chamber whatever information he is prepared to supply. I do not know that this chamber can order that anything be done, but I am willing to do my best to comply with the request of Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: I take my honourable friend's statement at its face value. I know he will do his best. But I think that as one of the Houses of Parliament we have the same right to demand production of papers as the other house, and it seems to me that if the minister then declines to produce the papers, he had better have some good reasons for doing so.

Senator Argue: That is why I was trying to make the point. If Senator Roblin wishes to put a motion on the order paper for the production of papers and that motion is passed, then that would have a great deal of authority. But he has asked me whether I would endeavour to do certain things, and I have agreed to endeavour so to do.

Senator Roblin: I thank the honourable minister. I shall await the exercise of his good offices, and if that does not produce results we will see what else can be done.

PARLIAMENT

LIBERAL AND NON-LIBERAL RIDINGS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I am wondering whether the leader still holds the view expressed at one of the annual meetings of his party that he attended, near Harrison Hot Springs, and as reported in a Canadian Press release, to the effect that he rejected the proposal that eastern members of Parliament should try to represent western ridings in the House of Commons, which was a suggestion that had been earlier made. The Leader of the Government was quoted as saying that no eastern MP should purport to speak for western ridings and that the role of opposition members in Parliament should not be usurped in any way.

I am wondering whether he still holds that view.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hold the view that members of the House of Commons and the Senate have a responsibility to all the people of the region they purport to represent, regardless of party affiliation. A member of Parliament, whether serving in the House of Commons or in this place, has a responsibility to the people of the constituency or region he or she purports to represent regardless of his or her political affiliation, and I hold to that view. I do not believe that we can ever institute any official system of having a member from one part of Canada represent a riding in another part of Canada. I do believe there is a great deal to be said for members of Parliament, wherever they live, trying to obtain more information and more comprehension of regional problems that exist in this country. If this twinning concept involves eastern members learning more about western problems and western constituencies, that would be highly commendable, and it is just as important for western members of Parliament, regardless of party, to learn more about the problems facing the Atlantic provinces, Ontario, Quebec and the North. In that way we are going to build a better and more united country.

[Senator Argue.]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Nurgitz: While I appreciate the response of the Leader of the Government, I would still like to know whether, in an official or a non-official capacity, the leader continues to reject the proposal for twinning.

Senator Perrault: If twinning is interpreted as meaning that a member from a Quebec or Ontario constituency assumes the right to speak on behalf of all the people of certain western constituencies, I reject that idea; but I do welcome the initiative that was going ahead in western Canada to have more members of other parts of Canada learn more about the problems of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Such knowledge would improve their performance as members of Parliament. However, if this hand of friendship is extended by members of Parliament from the eastern provinces, then western members of Parliament, regardless of party, should interest themselves in the problems that exist in other parts of Canada. It must not be a one-way street.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government having, in my view, somewhat switched his position, could those of us from the west know who our "unofficial" twin member is so that we might know who to speak to in terms of having a Liberal representative.

Senator Perrault: That really is a question that should be asked by one of the honourable senator's colleagues serving in the other place.

An Hon. Senator: Why?

Senator Perrault: I do not keep a list here, nor do I believe that a list of names of those members of Parliament from Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes who have some sort of special interest—and that is the best way to describe it—in the western ridings is kept by any honourable senator. I do know, however, that as far as this chamber is concerned, no senator of whom I am aware applies to any problem brought to him or her some sort of political test in terms of whether the person writing the letter is Liberal, Progressive Conservative, NDP, or anything else. One of the strengths of this place is that it is not politicized to the degree some other legislative chambers in this country happen to be.

Senator Choquette: Only when there is a vote.

Senator Perrault: That kind of political test will never be applied by government supporters in this place, and I know it is not being applied by members of the official opposition.

Senator Nurgitz: One final supplementary. I take it, then, there is a policy of not disclosing who the twin member is.

Senator Flynn: Do you know your own twin?

Senator Perrault: There seems to be almost a passionate zeal on the part of the official opposition to try to create the impression in the country that there is an attempt on the government side to suppress information. This has been one of the most forthcoming governments in the history of this country.

Senator Flynn: That is the best joke I have heard for some time.

Senator Nurgitz: Given the openness of the government leader, I trust he will not object to giving us in the next day or two the list of twin members.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator is seeking the assistance of one of these so-called twinned MPs in respect of a particular problem, why not send the problem over to us and we will do our best to solve it for him.

Senator Asselin: Produce the list.

THE ECONOMY

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Roblin's question of June 25 last regarding the broadening of the policy relating to small business development bonds so that these instruments could be used by small businessmen to raise working capital.

I wish to inform the honourable senator that I have consulted with the Minister of Finance on this matter. He indicated that the decision to introduce the measure on April 21, 1980, was based on the need to help small business continue to expand despite present interest rates. The proposal achieves this objective in two basic ways: first, it allows interest subsidies to small businesses for the purpose of acquiring new capital assets which are vital to expansion and to finance research and development expenditures.

Secondly, it allows interest subsidies to small corporations in financial difficulty and in this latter case the funds can be used for any business purpose including working capital needs.

It is important to note that this proposal endeavours to foster the development of small businesses. The government feels that the proposal, as outlined in the communiqué dated June 13, 1980, is the most efficient means of allocating scarce resources to attain this objective.

Accordingly, the Minister of Finance is of the view that it would not be appropriate to broaden the terms of small business development bonds so as to include all refinancing of working capital requirements.

I would be very happy to send the honourable senator a copy of that communiqué if he does not already have it.

ENERGY

PROMOTION OF PETROLEUM SUBSTITUTES—TAXATION POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to Senator Roblin's question of June 25 concerning the application of the seven cents per gallon (1.5 cents per litre) special excise tax on petroleum substitutes, in particular, gasohol, which is a blend of 90 per cent gasoline and 10 per cent alcohol. The government has received several inquiries about the application of the seven cents per gallon excise tax to gasohol.

Different provinces have adopted different positions. Manitoba, as the honourable senator knows, provides full exemption from its gasoline tax levies for gasohol. Ontario, on the other hand, exempts only that portion of the blended product which represents the alcohol content.

Complete exemption from the seven cents per gallon levy for gasohol could have adverse revenue consequences as well as encouraging wasteful use of this precious resource.

Various options which may achieve energy conservation by encouraging the use of gasoline substitutes are currently under review. No firm decision has been made to date as to whether any or all of them will be implemented.

Q & M PIPELINE—ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to a question directed to me by Senator Marshall on June 25 regarding the status of environmental studies related to the application by Q & M pipelines to construct a pipeline from near Quebec City to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated on several occasions that the government remains committed to reducing the dependence of the Atlantic provinces on imported oil and that the natural gas pipeline extension is a preferred way of achieving this objective. He stated last week in the other place that he has had two meetings with the promoters of the Q & M project and has asked them to continue their study on the environmental aspects identified by the National Energy Board. To date there has been no decision by the company to complete these studies or to file a new application with the NEB. The minister also indicated he hoped to discuss the project again in the near future with his provincial colleagues in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I might add that with regard to the Quebec extension, the Quebec government is expected to make a final decision on the pipeline's right of way under its land use legislation this summer so that construction can commence early next year. This would provide for completion of the Q & M pipeline as far east as Quebec City.

I would like to add also that while I now have the information respecting the question asked by Senator Marshall regarding shipbuilding, perhaps in view of the hour it would be satisfactory if I were to give that reply tomorrow.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on the status of the Garrison Dam controversy which may be of interest. The government is deeply disappointed at the July 2 decision taken at the House-Senate Conference to approve the additional Garrison appropriation of $9.7 million, particularly in light of the government's strong efforts through the embassy in Washington and the actions of the Manitoba government and the initiatives of concerned Canadian parliamentarians to make United States Congressmen well aware of Canada's concern over the provision of any new funding for the project.

The government has noted the stipulation of Congress that the additional appropriation will not be for work directly affecting Canada. Through our embassy, however, the government has this week secured confirmation from senior U.S. Administration officials that any construction activity funded by the new appropriation will not provide for any drainage into Canadian waters, that is inter-basin transfers.

While the government finds the recent action by Congress disturbing, it should be noted that the entire project remains under internal review by the U.S. Administration. Accordingly, the government will continue to take every available opportunity to reiterate Canada's concerns over the project as currently designed, and to urge that the project be modified to eliminate all inter-basin transfers of water and associated harmful foreign "biota." The United States government has given us formal assurances that it will honour its Boundary Waters Treaty obligations and commitments to Canada. We will continue to do everything possible to ensure that this will be the case.

Honourable senators, may I state in addition that I have been informed by the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister that Canada's concerns regarding Garrison were made known to President Carter at the Venice Summit Meeting, indicating the importance that the government places on this entire matter.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—MAIL DELIVERY GUARANTEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by the Honourable Senator Molson on June 5 regarding his concern for mail delivery guarantees. The answer is quite long, and in the interest of saving time it might be the wish of honourable senators to have this answer printed as part of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Or perhaps Honourable Senator Molson would like to receive the answer verbally tomorrow.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Molson: I would be quite satisfied, if it is an important statement, to have it placed on the record. If it is not, then I would be quite happy to have a copy of the reply.

Senator Flynn: Put it on the record.

Senator Perrault: Very well.

(The answer follows:)

Canada Post attaches the highest importance to achieving a high rate of reliability in mail delivery, and that it has achieved considerable success in meeting the most demanding specifications it has set for itself in this area.

The current first-class mail service specifications, developed to replace the "Assured Mail Program", were adopted in May, 1978, between 22 major offices and were subsequently extended to other post offices. According to these specifications, postal managers have introduced operating plans to ensure the following:

—next-day delivery for mail destined to the socio-economic area as determined by historical practices, customer expectations and needs;

—next-day delivery for closely paired cities where there has existed a precedent for this level of service and where operational capability permits this;

—second-day delivery to other selected paired cities where it is operationally possible; and

—third-day delivery to other post offices except isolated and remote areas.

The above basic service commitments apply to letter-size items and flats which comply with "Canadian Postal Standards".

Canada Post plans to better its performance and reliability by improving the integration of key centres and by keeping critical connections to a minimum. They are now analyzing operations at these key centres to ensure that the collection and delivery, processing and distribution systems within them perform effectively, both individually and when fully integrated.

To promote an understanding and commitment to service specifications, internal "rule books" are being prepared which outline the basic operational principles to be used at each individual plant in developing operational plans that will result in meeting schedules and time specifications. Moreover, to identify areas not meeting specifications we are establishing system and service performance indicators at the working level for the timely application of corrective measures.

Their specifications as to reliability have been set at a high level and much work remains to achieve these specifications across the whole country. In the upcoming planning period they will continue to concentrate our efforts towards meeting these higher standards.

In the recent past they have made substantial progress in improving their reliability. Canada Post remains confident that the above programs will contribute in no small measure to providing Canadians with a reliability in the mails that is second to none.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISHERIES—EAST COAST BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there was a question asked by Senator Marshall on June 12 regarding the East Coast Boundary controversy over fisheries. The question has been answered by a news release, on June 6 by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Again that could be printed as part of the record if honourable senators agree.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The news release follows:)

A ban on commercial fishing of Atlantic salmon, imposed in April 1972 as a conservation measure in certain areas of Atlantic Canada, will continue in 1980, Fisheries and Oceans Minister Roméo LeBlanc announced today.

"The ban," said Mr. LeBlanc, "was introduced as a conservation measure to allow salmon stocks to increase. However, the advice of our fisheries experts indicates that the recovery of the stocks has not yet reached a level to justify a resumption of commercial fishing."

The minister added that the department last year undertook a thorough review of the Atlantic salmon fishery, including biological considerations and the economic and social impact within the Atlantic provinces. A comprehensive plan is now being developed, covering management and the further enhancement potential for Atlantic salmon stocks.

Mr. LeBlanc said that subject to Federal Treasury Board approval, compensation payments will continue to be paid in 1980 to fishermen prevented from fishing as a result of the commercial salmon ban. This compensation amounts to approximately $1.5 million annually, and will continue at 1979 payment levels for some 700 commercial fishermen.

Because of the commitment made by the previous government to continue the ban on commercial salmon fishing, and due also to the fact that the new administration has not had sufficient time to fully assess the situation, a decision to reopen the fishery, even on a limited basis, could not have been made in time for the fishermen to gear up for the 1980 fishing season, said the minister.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO AND MIRABEL AIRPORTS—INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked on June 12 by the Honourable Senator Smith regarding user and landing fees at Ministry of Transport owned and operated airports.

The answer is as follows. The general policy is to recover the costs of facilities and services provided, at public expense, in support of air transportation. The specific cost recovery objective for facilities and services must, however, be assessed on its own merit. In the case of the proposed increases in landing fees and general terminal fees, there is a need to generate additional revenue to fund the Air Transportation Program. For example, a deficit of $356 million is forecast for the program in fiscal year 1980-81.

Honourable senators, I have other questions to which I shall give the replies tomorrow.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, would the honourable leader permit me to ask a further question about the Garrison project? Is he able to provide the house with a copy of the communication from the Government of the United States in respect to this matter. It would certainly help to clarify at least one person's understanding of the matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That inquiry will go forward, and if it is possible to provide that document it certainly will be tabled.

GRAIN

COUNTRY ELEVATOR SYSTEM—GRADE PROMOTION

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, a question was asked of me by the Honourable Senator Bielish on May 29. The question was as follows:

Could the minister inform the house and the farmers of western Canada whether he has investigated grade promotion or upgrading practised by the country elevator system and, if so, have the results of his investigation led to the assurance that the producer is receiving full value for his grains?

Honourable senators, the answer is somewhat lengthy and, if it is agreed, I will have it printed in the record as though it had been read at this point.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The fundamental principle of grain grading is to assure each producer on delivery to the country elevator receives the grade his grain is entitled to under the grade established by the Canadian Grain Commission. Where a dispute arises upon delivery, an agreed on sample by the farmer and the country elevator agent is submitted to the Canadian Grain Commission's chief inspector and the grade he establishes is binding on the purchase of the grain. Once the grain is in the elevator and ownership has changed, the elevator agent can then blend the grain in any manner he wishes to improve its quality. For example, he could buy grain from five farmers totalling 5,000 bushels, which was at the top of the No. 1 grade. He could buy grain from five farmers totalling 5,000 bushels, which was above average of the No. 2 grade, blend the two 5,000 lots together and ship 10,000 bushels that would grade No. 1. I use this as an extreme example for illustration purposes only. In practice, blending within the country system in total represents less than 10 per cent in grade gains. The overall benefit, while not directly, is certainly indirectly a benefit to the farmers. The elevator company has an earning that may allow it to operate at a lower country tariff than would otherwise be required. A producer co-operative elevator company has these additional funds that will in due course be distributed to its membership.

TRANSPORTATION

MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY, NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL GRANT FOR RESEARCH

Question No. 3—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Has Memorial University, in the Province of Newfoundland, ever applied for a federal grant for transportation research to focus university attention on Canadian transportation problems and to increase the number of students specializing in transportation studies for the industry and government?

2. If an application was received, was it approved? If not, why not?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

1. According to our records Memorial University of Newfoundland has not applied for a grant under the program supporting transportation research at various Canadian Universities.

At the present time there is provision for only one grant-supported centre for transportation studies in the Atlantic Provinces, the Canadian Marine Transportation Centre at Dalhousie University in Halifax. Under the "Centres of Excellence" policy the very limited federal funds available for transportation research activities at universities are directed to those universities which have well-developed and recognized transportation programs at the graduate level. Memorial is not one of these.

However, in 1974 Memorial University did receive a $4,500 grant from the Transportation Development Agency to help support a transportation conference in Gander.

2. Not applicable.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John. J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act.

[Senator Argue.]

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, happens to be a very short piece of legislation. It contains but two clauses, and its purpose is to extend a program that would have ended on March 31, 1981 to March 31, 1982. It extends also the time within which employers may register for participation in the program. The extension of that right is for one year. This is all contained in clause 1 of the bill.

• (2120)

Clause 2 of the bill says that the effective date of the amendment will be April 15, 1980, which is the day after that on which this session commenced.

Having said that, I think I can add that I have said more about this bill in these last few minutes than was said in the House of Commons in eight or nine days of debate. But the bill, for the Senate, is certainly a matter of déjà vu. In January 1978 the Senate had before it Bill C-23, which was an act to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the Employment Tax Credit Program. That bill was debated in this chamber on January 31 and February 1, 1978. For the record, that debate can be found in the Hansard of this house for the session of 1977-78 at pages 280 and 286. The bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which considered it on the 1st and 2nd days of February, 1978. For the record, committee's proceedings on the bill can be found in issue No. 15 for that session. The minister appeared before the committee, and so did officials of the department. The committee then reported to the Senate on the bill.

I should say something about the program envisaged here, if only to recall to honourable senators what we all knew two years ago but which, no doubt, like myself, everyone has forgotten in the meantime. In the first place, the Employment Tax Credit Program does not involve direct grants or subsidies or subventions in the public sector of the economy by governments. Programs of that kind have already been announced by the appropriate minister, and I think if I referred to them in a general way that would be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of all senators.

There are community service projects, community development projects, new technology employment programs, and employment programs for the disadvantaged. We also have a multiplicity of training programs which are the result of a direct subvention by the federal exchequer. Some of these programs are the Native Opportunity Training Program, the Critical Trade Skills Training Program, the Non-Traditional Training for Women, the Refugee Language Training Program, and so on. We have the Summer Youth Employment Program, the Canada Works Carryover Program, the Local Employment Assistance Program.

I am told that the sum total of all of these programs involves jobs or training places in the fiscal year for over 122,000 people, and that the cost is roughly $370 million.

This program, as honourable senators may remember, is an attempt to foster employment in the private sector of the economy by reducing the cost of wages paid for new jobs created by employers. The method used to assist the employer in the private sector to do that is to provide him with a tax credit. At this point perhaps I should say what the amount of the tax credit is in the various regions of the country. The regions are those prescribed in the Regional Development Incentives Act, which is a statute of this Parliament.

In the Atlantic region and the Gaspé the amount of the tax credit is $2 per hour per new job. In the more populous regions of southern Canada, both east and west, such as Montreal, western Quebec including Hull, southern Ontario and southern British Columbia, the amount of the tax credit is $1.50 per hour per new job. In the other regions of the country the tax credit is $1.75 per hour.

Those figures seem rather meaningless without being put into some context, and the best method to follow might be to use an example to explain how these proposed credits are to be applied. For the sake of an example, let us consider only the situation in the Atlantic region. Assume an employer creates a new job for which he will pay the new employee $5 an hour, and assume also that the employee in this new job will work a 40-hour week for 50 weeks. In one year he will have worked 2,000 hours, and the total cost of that job to the employer, therefore, will have been $5 times 2,000, or $10,000. Because we are talking about the Atlantic region, the tax credit will be determined at $2 per hour for 2,000 hours, and will be $4,000. That tax credit, under a provision in the mother act which amended the Income Tax Act, is taxable. So the $4,000 tax credit that became available to the employer is added to the employer's income.

Let us say that in this case the employer is the owner of a small business rather than of a large corporation. As honourable senators know, the income tax rate for small businesses is 25 per cent. Since $4,000 is to be added to the earned income of the small business it will be taxed at the rate of 25 per cent, and, therefore, the tax on that amount will be $1,000. The benefit therefore from the $4,000 taxable tax credit is $3,000, and that $3,000 accrues to the benefit of the employer.

● (2130)

The gross cost to the employer of this new job which he created is $10,000; the tax benefit that he gets under this legislation is $3,000, so the actual cost of that job for that first year—the only year in which he is entitled to this benefit—is $7,000. It costs him $7,000 to create a new job, for which he pays the employee $10,000.

That tax credit, honourable senators, can be carried forward for five years. Excluded from the program are temporary jobs and jobs of personal service. Two years ago, when we had this legislation before us, we discussed whether or not new ventures qualified. At that time we were told—and the rule still applies—that they do not.

There is a once only credit allowed for each job. The employee, in order to qualify for a new job, must be out of work for at least two weeks and he must be under the age of 65 years.

It may be of advantage and helpful to honourable senators if at this point I were permitted to place on the record a table showing the agreements signed and the jobs created in the fiscal year 1978-79, which was really the first year of the program, and the fiscal year 1979-80.

I might say that when the program was first announced in 1978, it was hoped that 50,000 jobs a year would be created. In the first fiscal year that expectation was not realized, only 16,711 jobs being created under the program. However, the program was thought to be valid enough for an intensive advertising campaign to be undertaken by the department, as a result of which in the fiscal year from March 31, 1979 to March 31, 1980, 50,906 jobs are said to have been created. The tables to which I have just referred give not only the number of jobs created in each of those two fiscal years but also give the number created by provinces.

May I also place on the record, honourable senators, another table showing the jobs by standard industrial code? I do not know too much about the meaning of the words "standard industrial code," but the table indicates the percentage of jobs that have been created in agriculture, forestry, fish and game, mines, manufacturing, construction, transportation, trade and commerce, finance and insurance, and services.

Perhaps honourable senators might be interested to know that 51 per cent of all the jobs were in manufacturing; 19 per cent were in trade and commerce; 12.7 per cent were in services, and there were smaller percentages in the other categories of employment. I now ask permission to place those two tables on the record?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Connolly: I am told that the majority of the firms that participated in the program were small business firms. In fact, 77 per cent of the firms which participated had less than 20 employees. Over 50 per cent of the people employed were under the age of 35. The average schooling that employees taken on under the plan had acquired was to the level of grade 11. The wages of the employees varied quite a bit by region, but the average was somewhere between $180 and $200 per week. I am told that 34 per cent of the persons employed were women, which is not a bad record when one considers the fact that women account for some 40 per cent of the work force.

I am informed that of the employers who participated, 92 per cent have said that they would participate again. It was hoped originally that the jobs would be continuing, permanent jobs. I am informed that 48 per cent have continued for more than the year in which the program was operative.

Honourable senators, this is not by any means a complete answer to the unemployment problem in this country, but I believe that from a poor start the program has picked up and it seems to me to be a valid type of program to have in place at a time like this.

We are not the only country that has programs founded upon similar concepts. There are similar programs in the United States, Spain, Sweden and France. I think the second year of experience with this program has proved to be more helpful and to have had a more positive effect than in other countries.

To summarize, I would use the example which I used originally. The 50,000 jobs created by this program in the second fiscal year, at $10,000 per job, mean that a half-billion dollars was put into the economy. The cost to the government, estimated to be the same as it was when the program was begun, was $100 million or 20 per cent; the 80 per cent or $400 million that went into the economy as a result of the program was contributed by the employers, who, of course, got the benefit of the work done by the new employees. The cost to a small businessman of a job that paid $10,000 a year, in the example I used, would be about $7,000. By comparison, the cost for a big businessman or a corporation would be about $8,000.

Honourable senators, as I have said, I do not think this program is a complete answer to the unemployment problem in this country, but it is an attempt, by co-operation between the public authority and the private sector, to do something positive about creating new jobs and, hopefully, permanent ones.

If the bill receives second reading and if honourable senators desire that it be sent to a committee, I would suggest that the appropriate committee is the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and I would make a motion to that effect.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault moved the second reading of Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

He said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, this amendment in Bill C-35 is simply for the purpose of extending the existing legislation for three years to December 31, 1984. I am sure that every member of this chamber, like the members of the other place, have had and still have a very deep interest in this legislation which was passed about 10 years ago.

If I remember correctly, His Honour the Speaker was the first Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thériault: I believe it was said by everyone who spoke on this amendment in the other place that great things have come out of this legislation—perhaps not everything we expected, but nevertheless progress has been made. Many people in government, including the new minister, his immediate predecessor, and others before him, feel that the time has arrived to take another in-depth look at the operations of that whole department.

I believe that proper legislation, or at least a paper on the program, would have been introduced by now had it not been—and my comments are not intended to be political—for the intervening elections with different ministers taking different views at different times.

I am informed that the present minister hoped to be able to present legislation encompassing the whole operation of the department before the expiry of this act, but found that more information and more studies were required and he, therefore, saw the necessity of introducing an amendment to extend the life of the statute by five years.

There are many reasons for this step. As many of you are aware, before a plant is built, machinery has to be ordered, and before the operation goes ahead a long time may elapse. I am informed that at the present time, under the existing legislation, at least 30 applications for incentives cannot be proceeded with because of the expiry date of December 31, 1981. I will not bore this chamber with more details of the reasons for the amendment. I think they are self-explanatory.

The benefits that have accrued, especially in the area of the country in which I live, the Atlantic provinces, and in some other parts of the country, are tremendous. I personally believe that this program and this department has to be strengthened. As the minister has requested, I believe it has to be funded in a more permanent manner since I am often told that when a prospective industry is approached, it is concerned about the permanency of the program and, therefore, does not really bother to take an in-depth look at establishing in an area where it may benefit by incentives under this program. Of course, that applies especially to major industries.

I hope this house will be afforded an opportunity to discuss the new legislation even before it is passed in the other place. Hopefully, that will come forward this fall or early next year. Regardless of what part of the country the members of this house are from, they will realize that progress has been made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in slow growth areas as a result of this legislation.

Nevertheless, I repeat that, in my humble opinion, the department has to be strengthened. The minister responsible for that program must be given an opportunity to have some say in the co-ordination of activities and programs of other departments. Over the years it has been found that different bureaucracies do not always see eye to eye on how to solve various problems, and sometimes empire building becomes more important than the net benefit to the people who are affected.

The amendment is, as I say, to extend the legislation until December 31, 1984. Therefore, honourable senators, I would hope that with these few words of explanation you will pass this measure, with hope that we will have an opportunity to put forward our views on the whole operation as soon as possible.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Copies of document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms or errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970", issued by the Department of Justice.

Report on the Audit of the Office of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, pursuant to section 7 of the Auditor General Act, Chapter 34, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, July 15, I will call the attention of the Senate to:

Some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights, (the British Columbia Reference Case) (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792 and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, by reason of which the said judgment does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

In view of the fact that I have had a similar Notice of Inquiry standing on the order paper for some time, perhaps I might be permitted a word of explanation. My purpose in proceeding with this second inquiry is simply to divide the subject into discussions of convenient length. If I were to deal with the whole problem in one speech, I am afraid I would inflict myself upon honourable senators, with their consent, until they might not be willing to continue that consent. So it seemed to me that to divide the subject matter which I wish to discuss into two would help honourable senators to endure what I have to say.

Senator Frith: Perhaps you might explain the two divisions.

Senator Smith: The first inquiry would deal with the judgment of the court itself—that is, what it says—and emphasize the fact that the judgment recognizes that there might be historical facts which are different in other places from those which the court had to consider in reference to British Columbia. That would be the subject of my first inquiry.

The second inquiry would be to go on to discuss what those facts are.

Senator Frith: Would it be the wish of the proposer that once his remarks with reference to the first inquiry were completed and someone on this side were to adjourn the debate, that that would be the time to do so; that is, to complete the first division of the inquiry and then to proceed to the second?

Senator Smith: That is what I rather hope will happen.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

REFERRAL TO LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms or errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970," tabled in the Senate this day, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

• (1405)

By way of explanation, honourable senators, this, I believe, is the third such periodic document proposing non-controversial amendments to statutes. Often they involve simple typographical errors, and the practice that has developed in both houses is to refer the document to the appropriate committee in each house. I understand that this document is being tabled in the House of Commons today and will be referred to their judicial committee. This is what happened in the case of the previous two, and for that reason I am moving that this document be referred to the appropriate committee in this chamber.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last evening the minister in reply to Senator Charbonneau reaffirmed the government policy that no prebuild of the Foothills pipeline would be permitted until ironclad guarantees had been received from the Americans that the entire line would be completed. The minister also cited progress over recent weeks insofar as achieving those necessary guarantees is concerned.

Would the minister indicate to us if the progress to which he alluded constitutes those absolute guarantees that Canada has been seeking?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, I have been around the political scene long enough to know that there is nothing quite as absolute as seems to be involved in that question. I suppose something could happen that would either delay or have some other effect on the assurances that have been given by the United States administration, the United States Houses of Congress and the producers and sponsors involved in the building and operating of this pipeline.

But I said last night, and I can reaffirm today, that there has been a great deal of progress made in getting all of the parties involved to a higher level of commitment. If you want my personal opinion, I believe an assessment of those commitments leads to the conclusion that all of those people in the United States are very anxious that the pipeline should be built in its entirety and, indeed, as soon as possible.

Senator Balfour: I have supplementary question for the minister. Accepting the remarks he has just made at their face value, I would, nevertheless, point out that approval of the prebuild, if it were to be given in the absence of absolute assurances that the remainder of the line would be built, would in effect constitute a decision to export Canadian natural gas. My question is this: Is it still the policy of the government, as enunciated by Mr. Lalonde last December 6, that our bias as Canadians should be against any gas exports outside of Canada, and that approval of further exports would go down in history as one of the greatest sell-outs we have seen?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should keep up with historical facts that have taken place. Obviously he has either not done his homework or he is ignoring some important facts.

Senator Perrault: The Tory Research Bureau.

Senator Olson: Yes, the Tory Research Bureau or whatever. The fact is that there have been some decisions made by the National Energy Board since December 6, 1979, after adequate hearings, that there is something over four trillion cubic feet of gas in excess of providing for all the requirements of Canadian use that are contained within the formula to arrive at that figure. It seems to me that the honourable senator should take those factors into account. That is not a decision made by the government. It is a decision made by a board that is set up with terms of reference, a board in which I would expect both sides of this house to have some confidence.

• (1410)

Senator Balfour: Is the minister in effect telling us that additional discoveries of natural gas have been made since December 6 last, which now justify the approval of massive exports of Canadian natural gas to the United States? Is that what he is saying?

Senator Olson: No, that is not what I said at all.

Senator Flynn: He tries never to say anything.

Senator Olson: What I said was that there were hearings under way probably before December 6. The consideration of the National Energy Board, who are charged with the responsibility of making an assessment of those hearings and all the data that support those hearings, is such that they have reached the conclusion, and indeed recommmended, that an export permit be granted for, I think it is, 4.2 trillion cubic feet of gas through more than one delivery point, some of which would go through the prebuild system.

Senator Balfour: Is the minister in effect saying that Mr. Lalonde, when he made his statement on December 6, had failed to do his homework?

Senator Olson: No, not at all.

Senator Flynn: Oh yes.

Senator Olson: In case the honourable senator is unaware of the fact, let me point out that that is over six months ago.

Senator Flynn: He wanted to win the election.

Senator Olson: There have been some important decisions made by the people charged with the responsibility of assessing the data and the submissions that are made to the National Energy Board, and that decision was not made until, I think, April, which is some time later than December 6.

Senator Flynn: Hot air. He only wanted to win the election.

Senator Perrault: You are living in the past over there.

Senator Flynn: You are living in the past and you are looking to the future.

Hon. G. I. Smith: It might do the honourable senator some good to consider the past too. I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Even he must find it very difficult to be certain in his own mind that Mr. Lalonde was well informed when he made those remarks last December.

Senator Olson: If I left the implication or imputation that Mr. Lalonde was not well informed then, I certainly want to take it back, because I think he was very well informed then.

Senator Flynn: You still don't know.

Senator Olson: I think the problem we have is that the honourable gentlemen of the opposition have not been informed of what has happened in the last three or four months.

Senator Perrault: They never have been.

Senator Flynn: You still don't know what the situation was.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I could, if I wished, I think, draw a parallel between the inability of the minister to explain Mr. Lalonde's statements with my inability to reconcile his statements with those of Mr. Axworthy in connection with the drought situation.

I am going to pursue this gas pipeline business if I may, and I have two questions to start out with. The honourable minister went to Washington recently, and after he came back, or at the same time, the American Congress passed what I call a comforting resolution in respect of the major pipeline development that is in prospect in Alberta. Was any indication given to my honourable friend that the conditions laid down by the American Congress in 1977 with respect to pipeline principles were discussed, and if so were any conclusions arrived at? I refer particularly to the resolution of the American Congress that the United States government would not participate in any way in the financing of such a pipeline. I want to know whether there has been any change in their position on that.

The second principle that was adopted by them at the same time had to do with the tracking of prices. My honourable friend may understand me if I try to explain it by saying that they declined to approve the charging of prices of gas coming from Canada in advance of the completion of the whole pipeline system.

● (1415)

Senator Olson: You mean from Alaska?

Senator Roblin: That's right. I am talking about the Alaska pipeline. We will come back to the prebuild in a minute or two; but I want to clear the ground, if I may, in the first instance, by inquiring whether any change was made in the principles adopted by the American Congress in 1977 on these two points.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should realize that the United States government or the Congress has not been asked to finance the pipeline. The pipeline was to be built with private financing. I do not think the United States government or Congress make it a practice of announcing that they stand behind the United States Treasury when they have not been asked to do so. So far as I am concerned, it is a rhetorical question.

In response to the honourable senator's comment that the motion was one of comfort, I would recommend that he read the motion that was passed in both Houses of Congress. It seems to me that the words are clear and positive. It does not change the law but it sets down in unequivocal terms the position of those two houses. In my view, that is far more than "comfort".

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Roblin: I am glad that my honourable friend is soothed by what he learned in Washington, but I have to tell him that my questions are not rhetorical. I am referring him to the resolution of the United States Congress which prohibits the financing of the pipeline by the United States government. The minister knows—better than most, I suspect—that the main hangup today in proceeding with that pipeline is financing. So we can have all kinds of encouragement from the United States Congress, but if they persist in their attitude toward government financing, the situation will remain unclear. I am making no judgment as to whether that is good or bad; that is their business. I am merely trying to find out what their position is, and I take it from the minister that if it remains unchanged on those particulars, they will not participate in financing and they will not allow charging for the gas until the whole of that pipeline is completed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is still a rhetorical question, because I fail to understand how the United States Congress or the United States administration can be expected to commit the United States Treasury to financing the pipeline when they have not been asked to do so. If there are some conditions that appear to make that a desirable thing to do in the interests of the United States, I suppose they can make whatever decision they want based on those facts. However, at the moment the honourable senator should take into account the fact that the sponsors and the producers have committed themselves and signed an agreement to provide $500 million to complete the design and survey—I guess that is what one would call it—of the Alaska section of the pipeline.

Some people might say that that is a small amount, but I think that $500 million is a pretty significant amount. In fact, I consider it to be an indication that the private financiers who eventually will be asked to put the financing package together are pretty heavily committed to building the pipeline. In addition, the producers already have several billion dollars invested in Prudhoe Bay, which provides some incentive to see that the whole job is completed.

The United States administration, through their President and Secretary of Energy have on several occasions repeated to me—indeed it was reiterated by the Vice President of the United States, whom I met at the White House when I was in Washington—in the strongest possible terms their commitment to have the whole pipeline built.

In addition, and for reasons that should be obvious to my honourable friend, both Houses of Congress have passed a firm resolution that they too are committed to having the whole pipeline built.

● (1420)

It seems to me that if we are going to acquiesce to the kind of interpretation of what "absolute commitment" means, then perhaps we in Canada should wait until the U.S. has the pipeline built right to the Yukon border. That kind of action was never anticipated by the Canadian Parliament. We were going to go ahead with the construction of this together. It seems to me that the level of commitment by all parties involved is now very high.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we shall see just how far we get along with this.

Senator Perrault: Have a little faith.

Senator Roblin: I am making no effort here to decide what the policy of the United States government is; that is entirely their business. I am merely trying to ascertain the facts.

If my honourable friend had contented himself with simply saying, "Yes, the 1977 situation still persists," that would have satisfied me, since I believe that to be the truth. However, my honourable friend is going to find that some reconsideration, at least of the pricing portion of the 1977 decision in Washington, may be required to secure the financing of expenditure which now appears will be about $20 billion.

I come now to the question of the prebuild pipeline, a subject raised by one of my honourable colleagues. Has there been any change in the policy of the Canadian government toward the prebuild? I gather from the minister's rather canny answer that there probably has been, so we will wait and see what happens with respect to that.

I would ask him a question with respect to markets and prices in the United States in connection with the prebuild which, if it takes place, will allow for the export of a very large quantity of gas. We know, in connection with our present exports to the United States through British Columbia and Alberta, that users in some parts of the United States are not taking their full quotas; in fact, they are down to about 30 per cent in connection with the B.C. delivery, and that raises the question of price. Price, of course, is a significant factor in connection with financing the prebuild.

Can my honourable friend give us any statement as to what policy approaches he is taking in connection with the price negotiations for the delivery of prebuild gas, which certainly has to be a major consideration in the negotiations now taking place?

Senator Olson: The price of the prebuild gas will, I expect, be exactly the same as any other exports of gas to the United States.

My honourable friend knows that there was a change in the formula relative to the factors taken into account with respect to what the price is going to be. There was also a change announced last April as to the method and application of that price. However, that does not force United States customers to buy Canadian gas at any price and in any volume. We do not have a 100 per cent take-or-pay provision within the contracts, not only with respect to this one but with respect to previous contracts.

My honourable friend ought to know also that there is a gas bubble inside the continental United States so that there is no particular pressure during the summer of 1980 for some additional supplies. In addition, there is a lot of residual fuel around providing the BTU requirements which gas would fulfil under other conditions. That means there is a soft market at the moment in the United States. However, all of the projections I have seen indicate that that will be very short-lived and, indeed, it is the policy of the United States government to bring on the rest of the gas that may be available to them as soon as it can make the connection from the North Slope to the lower 48 states.

Senator Roblin: What does my honourable friend have to say about the attitude of the American government towards pricing? In connection with the main Alaskan pipeline, it has warned us that, in accordance with the 1977 resolution of Congress, it will not be able to project costs forward into the United States until the pipeline is completed. What relationship has the prebuild section to the 1977 resolution?

Senator Olson: I am not sure if you can relate the two. I find it difficult to try to interpret the attitude of the United States government; I would rather go on what it has very firmly said, but that would be repetitious of what I said a few minutes ago. I do not think that it would be a proper thing for any Canadian minister to try to interpret the attitude of the United States government. I can produce a copy of the resolution passed in Congress. I can produce a copy of the agreement that was signed between the producers and the sponsors of the Northern Pipeline in the United States, including the Alaska section, and I can produce a copy of the commitments made by the United States administration. If he adds that all together, I think my honourable friend can interpret the attitude of the United States as well as I can.

• (1425)

Senator Roblin: Well, I will try one last time to get my point across. The 1977 decision also prohibits the charges for any section of the pipeline from starting until all sections are completed. That raises the question of whether this particular resolution covers the prebuild, which, in my opinion, is part of the main pipeline, or whether it does not. Does my honourable friend intend to investigate that matter?

Senator Olson: I believe that my honourable friend can find the answer to that, and I will help him to do so. But my understanding of the prebuild is that a specified amount of gas will be delivered through that pipeline during the term of the contract, which I believe is something like six years, and the admissible price into the United States is known.

Senator Roblin: What is it?

Senator Olson: It is $4.47 at the moment, but the formula to determine that level changes it from time to time based on the substitution value of BTUs equivalent to imported oil into Canada. That determines the price at which it will be admissible to the United States, but it doesn't force United States customers to buy it, and, obviously, whoever is making that decision, whether it is the producers, the National Energy Board, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Canada or others, will have to take into account market conditions from time to time.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the pricing of gas that may move through the prebuild section if it goes ahead.

The honourable minister may be aware that within the last couple of weeks the Governor of Utah was in Alberta and was interviewed on a television program in which this question of United States purchase of western Canada gas through the prebuild section of this line, if it goes ahead, was raised. He expressed the view that Canadians need to realize there is a change in attitude developing in northwestern states regarding the purchase of Canadian gas because they feel the price is getting so high that it will no longer be competitive with the price of other forms of energy. He particularly mentioned that large-scale commitments were being made to generate electric energy by using coal as an alternative to Canadian gas.

I think the minister will agree that as far as the prebuild section of the line is concerned—at least, as I understand it—the only gas that will be moving through it until the total line is built on up to Alaska will be Canadian gas going to American markets. If as a result of jacking up the price of the gas at the border to the point where Americans feel it is no longer economically viable to use it, I think the minister would agree that that would raise a serious question with respect to the prebuild section, because there is no point having it except to move Canadian gas to American markets in the near future.

● (1430)

I assume that the Canadian government is monitoring the U.S. attitude towards the price it is now paying. If there is a serious problem, surely it should be thoroughly investigated before the prebuild is proceeded with, because we don't need the prebuild if the Americans are not prepared to buy the gas. The prebuild section would just sit there if it were not economically viable for the Americans to buy the gas. My own view is that it has not reached that stage.

I thought the statement by the Governor of Utah was not a criticism. He was simply pointing out that, while Americans prefer power generated by Canadian gas to power generated by local coal, the price of the Canadian gas is reaching a level where it is questionable whether it is economically viable for them to use it.

My question is: In view of the direct relationship between the selling price of gas in the United States and the cost of the prebuild section, is the Canadian government taking a serious look at the whole pricing issue?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Canadian government is looking at that. The agreement reached with Secretary Duncan in April was that there be an agreement on the formula Canada would use in adjusting its price from time to time. That agreement was based on the substitution or BTU equivalent of oil imported into Canada at Montreal.

The United States is also buying oil in that same market, the world market. Therefore it seems to me that there would be no time at which Canadian gas would be out of step with that alternative fuel.

The argument can be made, of course, that for some purposes coal could be substituted, providing the price of coal remained at a percentage below the BTU equivalent of world prices. I don't argue with that; it is a decision they would have to make.

[Senator Manning.]

It seems to me that Canada is justified in not offering its fuel to the United States at a price lower than they charge themselves. On that basis there will be times when a soft market exists, and I suppose we have such a market now. We have experienced a reasonably mild winter, and therefore a smaller amount of gas than normal was used. This is also true of residual fuel that substitutes for gas in much of the same market. This situation could change dramatically, and I suppose that American consumers would have to make a decision on that basis, and also on the basis of security of future supply.

It seems to me that for Americans to be hooked to a pipeline from Canada, and indeed to their own gas from Prudhoe Bay, is a far more secure position than relying on the changes that could take place with respect to imported oil. That ought to be taken into account.

I know of these concerns, but I do not believe it would be wise for Canada to enter into long-term agreements that would prevent us from recovering the number of dollars that it would cost for the substitution and, indeed, to be in a position where we would be required or obliged to supply gas to American customers at a price that could eventually be substantially lower than they are paying their own producers.

I know there are some distortions in that market at the moment, but I think all long-term projections indicate that there will be a viable market in the United States whenever we have any excess gas to sell them.

Senator Manning: I might make one further comment and then perhaps the minister could enlarge somewhat on this point. I think that basically we all agree that Canada should not sell an energy resource to another country at a price less than that country charges its own domestic customers, or at a price lower than that country would have to pay for the resource elsewhere.

Does the minister agree that with respect to the sale of surplus Canadian gas to the United States there are two advantages to this country in addition to getting a fair and just price for our gas? The first advantage would be the alleviation of our serious balance of payments problem. The sale of surplus Canadian gas affords us one opportunity to partially alleviate that serious balance of payments problem. It seems to me that the Government of Canada should attach some monetary value to that when considering the price of gas to the United States—in other words, it is a benefit not directly related to the price we get for our gas.

The second advantage would be in the reduction of the large volume of capped gas which exists in western Canada awaiting a market. That has now reached the point where it is having a serious detrimental impact on further exploration and development.

I suggest that these two things—the balance of payments problem and the maintenance of stimulation of exploration and development—are directly tied to the export market. I would hate to see Canada quibble over a few cents per one thousand cubic feet for the gas, thereby losing benefits to Canada that would result from the export of that surplus gas. I am interested in knowing whether the government is considering those aspects as well.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, information supplied to us indicates that the value of the gas exported through the prebuild is approximately $17 billion, based on an 8 percent escalating factor. Indeed, that escalating factor is probably going to exceed that. We are very conscious of what something over $2 billion a year would do to our balance of payments problem.

We are also conscious of the fact that there is a great deal of additional gas that has been added to the reserves since the National Energy Board considered the amount it is now ready to approve for export. There has been no further application, however, for a permit to export more gas, although we know there is a great deal more there. There are over 8,000 capped wells in Alberta that are not producing now because of a lack of markets.

We are taking all that into account, but there is another major thrust of the government that has to be taken into account. We are determined that Canadians from coast to coast will have access to this high quality clean fuel. So the amount we require to go into the rest of the line—that is, the Q & M line to Halifax and beyond, if necessary, and indeed further penetration into the existing market now served by a pipeline—has a high priority. Therefore, it seems to me that the National Energy Board and others should take a look at the totality of those requirements and then determine whether we have enough reserves to take care of all needs in the reasonable future. If there is more gas available in excess of all that, then I suppose a further application to the National Energy Board would be warranted.

● (1440)

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I hesitate to prolong the discussion on this particular subject, but it is a matter of such vital importance to not only the west, but to all of Canada, that I shall take another minute or two on it. I am disturbed by what seems to me—and I hope I am wrong—to be a rather negative attitude towards the prebuild on the part of members of the opposition—and I do not include Senator Manning in that.

Many of us in years past, as Senator Olson is aware, fought rather strenuously in various forums, with whatever means we had at our disposal, to assist the United States in making the decision to bring this gas from Alaska across Canada as opposed to having it transported in liquefied form via tanker down the west coast, which was the El Paso proposal—a proposal which was a very serious threat for a long time.

I am concerned—and I should like the minister to let me have whatever indication he may have from his officials in this respect—as to the length of time, within reasonable economic limits, the gas in Alaska can be re-injected into the ground, as it has to be at the moment in order to enable them to produce the oil which they need up there, and which they are bringing out through the Alyeska line.

I am concerned that if we do not move with the assurances we now have on the prebuild, as a first step to constructing this pipeline to Alaska, the United States is going to decide one day that they do not have a forthcoming partner in this great project in Canada and start looking at the El Paso proposal once again. To prevent any such thing happening, I think we need to give careful consideration to just how long they can economically re-inject that gas, and I am wondering whether the minister has any idea as to what that length of time might be.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not have the technical data that is being requested by Senator van Roggen, and I am not sure that that data is available anywhere inside the Canadian government establishment, whether in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or anywhere else. I could make inquiries of some of the United States technical people, who probably do know. I have heard from reliable people, however, that, given the physical capability of the re-injection of that gas and the cost of compressing it so that it can be re-injected, it is getting to the point where, in respect of the production of oil at Prudhoe Bay, putting the gas into a pipeline for delivery to the United States would be by far the most economical and sensible way of handling it.

I would like to make one slight correction to Senator van Roggen's comments, and that is to say that it has not been anything that we failed to do in Canada that has held up the construction of this pipeline. We have been ready for many, many months to proceed with all of the commitments that we made. I made it clear to the United States congressional leaders, and to their secretary—and they acknowledged the truth of this—that the reason we are not on the targets that were set out in 1977 is the lack of action that was needed in the United States, not in Canada.

I would not want to leave the impression that we acknowledge that we have failed in any way to meet all of the commitments we made. Both our parliamentary and our regulatory authorities have been ready to go for many months, as well as Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd.

Senator van Roggen: Just to make my position quite clear, nothing in my remarks was meant to indicate that I felt that we in Canada had been in any way negligent in staying completely ahead of the United States throughout this whole period. I am simply saying that I would not want to see the negativeness I detect in some of the questions of the opposition result in our not being forthcoming at this particular time after the United States Congress and administration have been as forthcoming as they have been.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question again has to do with the reduction of the subsidy to the shipbuilding industry from 20 per cent to 9 per cent. This is a question I asked on June 19 and again last evening, and the minister now probably has an answer—but I think I can pre-empt him on it. I read in the Ottawa Citizen that a new program is to go into effect.

Could the minister go beyond that to allay the fears of the shipbuilding industry that this reduction will destroy their competitiveness in the international marketplace?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator will not pre-empt me by reading it in the Ottawa Citizen, because anyone could have read it in Hansard of the other place for July 7.

Senator Marshall: My copy of Hansard came late.

Senator Olson: As was stated by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, on July 7, the government intends to carry out extensive consultations with the industry, labour and the provinces with respect to the long-term future of shipbuilding in Canada. Honourable senators will appreciate that I would not wish to prejudice those discussions by speculating on the nature of the outcome of such consultations.

The Canadian shipbuilding industry is currently in a state of relative good health, with orders on the books to provide work well into 1981 in some cases, and until 1982 in others. I think, for example, of the Marystown shipyard, which is currently busy with construction of a replacement for the Cygnus fisheries patrol vessel, as well as new trawlers.

I would not want to add anything more to that. My honourable friend knows that there will be time for some consideration of this change, and in the meantime most of the shipyards in Canada, with one or two exceptions, are working at near-full capacity.

Senator Marshall: In spite of the assurance from the minister that the industry is in good health, that does not comply with the position of the president of the Canadian shipbuilding industry, who fears that the reduction of the subsidy will destroy the competitiveness of the Canadian shipbuilding industry.

Given the fact that the government is prepared to help Chrysler Canada to the tune of $250 million, and the Michelin Tire Company, can the minister explain why it is there is no apparent concern for the jobs lost as a result of the Canadian shipbuilding industry being non-competitive?

I appreciate that the minister has said that they now have contracts taking them into 1981 and 1982, but evidently the president of the shipbuilding industry does not share his view as far as the impact of this reduction is concerned.

Senator Olson: I guess the president can put any interpretation that he wants to on the situation, and I suppose my honourable friend can put his interpretation on it, as can the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I suppose if one wants to look far enough into the future, one can find some validity to that at some point in time.

It seems to me it is reasonably comforting to know that these shipyards will be busy well into next year, and beyond in many cases. Of further comfort is the commitment that has been made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to look into the matter. It may be that the shipbuilding industry does not need a subsidy of 20 per cent in perpetuity. I do not know that. It may be that it does require some subsidy so as to be competitive in the international marketplace.

It would be premature for me to discuss that in detail until the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has finished its survey of what is required. I am sure my honourable friend would not want us to subsidize that or any other industry beyond what is necessary to make the industry competitive.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SPACE RESEARCH

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development and it is in respect of Canada's space future. In January of this year the previous government announced a $43 million space science research program, to be spread over six years. Can the minister assure us that the cabinet is taking this matter into consideration and will approve such a program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I really cannot reply to that. My honourable friend knows that the cabinet announces decisions after they are made, not before.

Senator Yuzyk: But has the matter been considered at all up to the present time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not the practice of this government, nor any other government, to announce what is on the agenda for cabinet meetings.

Senator Smith: Oh, come on!

• (1450)

Senator Flynn: Why didn't you say you didn't know?

Senator Olson: Because I do know.

Senator Yuzyk: It is rather alarming to me because I would like to call to the attention of the government the fact that very recently Dr. Ian McDiarmid, associate director of the National Research Council, Herzberg Institute of Astrophysics, and director of its Space Science Co-ordination Office, stated that if the program is not approved soon "it will be almost equivalent to deciding that we do not want to do space science in this country for the next 10 years."

Senator Olson: Honourable senator, what you are really asking me to do now is comment on someone else's opinion. I am not in the habit of doing that. The commitment by the government is clear; it was in the Speech from the Throne. We are going to move it up from what it was then—it was, I think, about .9 per cent of GNE—to 1.5 per cent of GNE. We have some programs and some policies now under consideration to achieve the objective that was set out. We did not say we were going to do it in the next two or three months. So I guess my honourable friend will have to wait until the cabinet has made decisions before he can expect me to tell him what those decisions are. But for him to claim that someone else's opinion of what cabinet is doing is factual and not just an opinion, of course, is something that I cannot accept.

Senator Yuzyk: But this was the opinion of a leading scientist. I think we have to have a lot of patience to find out what the government intends to do in such important matters as this.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

MAJOR CHAIN STORES—ALLEGATIONS OF DEMANDS FOR REBATES FROM SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would the minister indicate if the government is intending to act on the request by the Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Institute that the issue of rebates being demanded of small manufacturers by both the Hudson Bay Company and the Simpson Company be investigated both from the perspective of the effect it is having on small industry and in terms of its cost to the consumer?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will have to take that question as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONFERENCE AT WOLFVILLE, NOVA SCOTIA—ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to my genial and eloquent friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to a very important Atlantic Canada conference on the Constitution of Canada held recently in Acadia University in Wolfville which was attended by all the maritime premiers and members of the Atlantic Progressive Conservative caucus including my colleague, Senator Smith. Can the minister indicate why no member of the government attended this significant gathering, or if it was ever suggested that senatorial members of the government or senatorial supporters of the government might attend and thus show Atlantic Canada a degree of interest in their contribution to a major national issue?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that that conference was held last weekend when there was another event of some national significance held in Winnipeg at which a great many Canadians gathered to discuss the problems of many parts of Canada including Atlantic Canada. There was difficulty for many of the ministers as a result of their efforts to attend the Atlantic conference.

Senator Macquarrie: Just for clarification, I was wondering about the attendance of members of the government during the two-and-a-half days before the Winnipeg conclave.

Senator Perrault: Of course, the Winnipeg conclave required a great deal of preparatory work.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC CANADA—PASSENGER AND FREIGHT FACILITIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I want to direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I should think that economic development in any country involves the transportation of people and goods in that country. This leads me to the question I want to pose to the minister. Of course, he will not have the answer today, but this will serve as notice to him.

I would like to know why VIA Rail is having to resort to hiring buses to transport people in the Atlantic region because their rail liners are so overcrowded. VIA Rail, at great cost, is hiring buses to transport people.

In the meantime Canadian National are stalling, as usual, with respect to transporting goods to the great province of Newfoundland by not having the necessary rolling stock located conveniently, and by having carloads of goods lying on sidings at the mainland ports while businessmen in Newfoundland are awaiting those goods that should be transported as quickly as possible.

In so many words, Mr. Minister, it would appear to me that Canadian National and VIA Rail are continuing a practice started some years ago. They are showing a profit and Dr. Bandeen boasts about it, but they are making it difficult for people to use, and so are discouraging them from using, Canadian National facilities. They are driving business away, and thereby reducing the need for rolling stock, freight cars and passenger cars to the point where they are reducing employment in that particular region of Canada. I know it is a difficult problem right across the country, particularly in the west in respect of the handling of wheat, and so on.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): As the honourable senator indicated, I would have to take this question as notice. It would be helpful if he could indicate to me—or send the information to my office—the places where this has happened, and I shall refer the question to the Minister of Transport who will provide an answer to it.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PORT HAWKESBURY AND GLACE BAY—REPORTED SHUTDOWN OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Muir's question of June 25 regarding the possibility of cutbacks in the production of heavy water at the Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay plants in Nova Scotia.

There has been no change in the situation since I replied to the same question of the honourable senator on June 11. I would like to take this opportunity to stress again that there are no plans to cut back on production at the heavy water plants in Nova Scotia.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Charbonneau's question of June 25 regarding renegotiation of the Canada-United States agreement on automotive products, referred to as the auto pact.

Over its term, the auto pact has been good for Canada, providing jobs for Canadian workers and ensuring the growth of a strong and competitive automobile industry in Canada despite some problems that have arisen, particularly in areas of parts sourcing, R&D and engineering.

I am sure the honourable senator is well aware that, at the present time, the automobile industry is facing a transitional period due to the very large increases in fuel prices in recent years and improved pollution and safety standards. It is a period wherein the industry is having to make very substantial investments in R&D, capital equipment and productivity improvement in order to ready the industry for the requirements of the rest of this century.

Ensuring that Canada and Canadian workers get a fair share of these developments is the reason why the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has initiated discussions with the Canadian and United States heads of the North American auto industry, and why the minister met with the United States special trade representative, Reuben Askew, in Washington recently—the same day that I was there, by the way. The minister, on July 2 in the other place, indicated that he "put our case forcefully" including the mix of automobile products to be manufactured in Canada in the post-transition period and the sourcing of auto parts in Canada.

● (1500)

I wish to note in this regard that during the Chrysler negotiations the federal government got new commitments from Chrysler on the sourcing of parts and materials as one of the several firm conditions for the loan guarantees to the company in 1982. It is the intention of this government to negotiate better operation of the auto pact, and while it is not desired, nor is there any intention, to seek a total renegotiation of the pact, there will be some changes to it. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has indicated that discussions will continue until we get the results that we are seeking in the interests of Canadian auto workers.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of replies to questions asked in recent days. First of all, there was a question from Senator Doody on June 5, 1980, regarding the 37½-hour work week in the Post Office.

As part of normal operations volume, counts of mail entering and leaving postal plants are taken daily to assist management in such things as identifying and staffing peak periods. This system of monitoring mail flows should provide a good base for monitoring whether the productivity goals, negotiated with CUPW, are being met.

Insofar as changing the hours of work for supervisors is concerned, this is a negotiation item which comes under the authority of Treasury Board. Nevertheless, the Post Office and the Treasury Board will certainly consider the effect of this provision negotiated with CUPW in the current negotiations with the supervisory personnel bargaining unit.

The honourable senator also asked:

> I understand that this agreement by which 40 hours' work is to be done in a 37½-hour week is applicable to the postal workers, or at least to that unit covered by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Will the same circumstances and conditions be applied to other people employed by the Public Service directly, or by crown agencies, or is this to be specifically related to the Post Office and to no other area of government?

Here again the question of hours of work is a bargaining item under the authority of Treasury Board. It is reasonable to assume that bargaining units will continue to put forward such demands as they have in the past.

It should be pointed out, however, that the recently negotiated contract with CUPW recognizes that inside postal workers work in an industrial environment which is quite different from most other groups in the public service. For instance, such benefits as flexible hours are not available to workers in postal plants.

It should also be emphasized that the hours of work negotiated with CUPW are dependent on productivity. The government has made it clear it will not consider them to be an acquired right in future negotiations unless increased productivity is achieved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Marshall relating to the exemption of the $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement to war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients and the re-introduction of Bill C-28.

I am pleased to advise that the Governor in Council has authorized an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance Regulations, whereby the recent increase of $35 a month in the Guaranteed Income Supplement has been exempted as income for allowance purposes, effective July 1, 1980. I know all members of the Senate will welcome this announcement. This has been done to ensure that eligible war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients over the age of 65 benefit to the same degree as guaranteed income supplement recipients in general.

With reference to the re-introduction of Bill C-28, the minister, as a veteran, informs me that he was pleased with this legislation and proud that many of the measures contained in the bill were the result of initiatives he took when he was minister. He will soon be proposing legislative measures which will include his own priorities for veterans and their dependents.

Senator Flynn: Is that what they are discussing this afternoon?

Senator Perrault: Yes, I think it covers the same area. The reply has just been received, but you have it as it came from the minister. Very soon, he said.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ARTILLERY SYSTEMS—PARTICIPATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION (QUEBEC)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 18 there was a question asked by the distinguished Senator Macquarrie regarding the participation of Space Research Corporation in the International Conference on Artillery Systems. He asked on June 18 whether the government had any feelings of misgiving, or any sense that something inappropriate was taking place, in that the Government of Canada was "supporting the holding of a conference in the Ottawa Conference Centre."

The government believed that it was appropriate that the International Conference on Artilleries Systems take place in the Government Conference Centre. The conference was a technical one intended to examine where NATO was going in the area of large calibre ammunition. While this conference was organized with the help of the Canadian government, which clearly had an interest in and a responsibility for maintaining and modernizing defence forces of Canada, it was, in fact, arranged by the American Defence Preparedness Association (ADPA).

The invitations to the participating individuals and companies were issued by ADPA. I am told that scientists from Space Research Corporation (Quebec) (SRC(Q)), neither of whom have been found guilty in an American court of supplying arms to South Africa, were invited by ADPA because of their expertise in the subjects to be discussed. Their participation had no connection whatsoever with the issue involving SRC(Q) that is now the subject of legal proceedings in Canada. In this regard, the honourable senator may be aware that the Canadian government is at present examining the organization and the operations of SRC(Q) and some of its affiliated companies.

I want to take the opportunity to reiterate the wholehearted commitment of the Canadian government to the United Nations' embargo on the sale of military equipment to South Africa and its determination to enforce both the embargo and Canada's own laws.

Regarding the other aspect of the question, I do not believe that the government's commitment to seek international disarmament, which I also wish to reaffirm, is put in any doubt by its participation in a technical conference such as this. Indeed, the government believes it can pursue this commitment best through its NATO relationship.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MARIJUANA—NATIONAL EDUCATION PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Finally, I have a reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Haidasz on June 27 regarding marijuana prosecutions and the government's policy on the possession of marijuana.

The Attorney General of Canada has recognized the severity of a seven-year minimum jail sentence in those instances where small quantities of cannabis are brought into Canada unlawfully. Federal prosecutors are expected to exercise their discretion in the laying of charges for importing cannabis, and in those cases where small quantities are brought into Canada in circumstances that do not suggest a commercial venture the discretion may be exercised in favour of laying the lesser charge of possession or possession for the purpose of trafficking. In addition, an interdepartmental committee has been considering these and other questions concerning the law as it relates to cannabis.

Recommendations for changes may be expected in the near future. I do not know whether those recommendations will propose an "exact amount that will be regarded as possession for personal use only".

In the Toronto case used by the honourable senator to illustrate his point, the discretion had been exercised and a charge of possession for the purposes of trafficking was before the court. If convicted, the accused would have been liable to imprisonment for life. However, she gave evidence in the course of the trial to the effect that she had purchased the marijuana in Jamaica and was taking it to her home in Japan for her own personal use. The judge accepted her explanation and convicted her of possession, which is a lesser offence and carries a maximum penalty of seven years' imprisonment. The accused had been in custody for approximately two months awaiting trial and was sentenced to an additional three months' imprisonment. This was an unusual case and it is not certain that is provides compelling argument for the application of weight limits in possession offences, but I am given to understand that this is within the terms of reference of the interdepartmental committee.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to report on the possible date of commencement of the summer recess. I wish I had a final report, but I don't. However, I think it fair to give honourable senators notice of the present situation as we see it.

• (1510)

There is hope and some possibility of our rising for the summer recess at the end of next week—that is July 17 or 18.

I believe there is a concerted effort on both sides in the other place, and in this house too, to achieve that result. If I were forced to place a bet on it, I do not think I would place it at anything better than six to five, but there is that possibility, particularly because I believe the leaders in both houses and of all three parties hope to achieve that result.

If it looks as if that is indeed an achievable result, we will be asking honourable senators to sit possibly Monday evening or Tuesday afternoon of next week to enable us to get a good head start and to dispose of those bills that appear to raise no serious controversy on either side. We can then shoot for royal assent on either Thursday of Friday.

At present the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government and I have consulted daily on this subject, and following some conferences that are to take place in the House of Commons we should have a clearer picture by tomorrow's sitting. Therefore I shall advise honourable senators tomorrow as to whether we—that is the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government and I—believe we can complete our deliberations by the end of next week. I thought that honourable senators would like to have an indication of what we had in mind concerning the target date.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Thériault for second reading of Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not detain the house for any great length of time on this bill because I have no quarrel with the substance of the matter that is contained within it. It provides authority for an extension of the present Regional Development Incentives Act for a further period ending December 31, 1984.

It is of interest to note that this represents a change from the original bill introduced in the House of Commons, in which the termination date was 1986. I suspect the reason for the reduction in the term is because it is pretty generally recognized that it would be a good idea to have a complete review of the operation and principles of the Regional Development Incentives Act, and one way to insure that would be to put a relatively short term on its continued life. I must say that if that is the reason for reducing the term of the bill, I approve of it.

One of the committees of the Senate is at present investigating the whole question of DREE, which, of course, is involved with this piece of legislation. We are asking ourselves a number of questions about it. We are interested to know how we can approach some impartial assessment of the results that have been achieved, how we can decide which of the tools used in regional development are most effective, whether they can be improved, and if there are any that should be dropped. We are interested in the question of the value of subsidies by DREE compared to the principle of unsubsidized economic viability. We are interested in knowing whether the emphasis should be placed on small business development under this act—I myself think it should be—and to what extent it should be extended to cover larger industries, as it does from time to time.

We are also interested in the question of co-ordination between the DREE administration and other departments of the government, and whether the present arrangements put sufficient muscle in the hands of the DREE ministry in order to obtain the sort of co-ordination and co-operation that would be required to give full expression to the thrust of this act.

Although we have not yet got around to it, I suppose we are going to look at the size of the DREE budget. I believe it is a fact that over a period of time the percentage of the federal effort going into DREE has declined by almost a half. I believe it was 2.1 per cent in 1970 and 1.1 per cent in 1977. Surely that raises the question of whether this trend in policy is desirable.

All in all I consider it wise to have reduced the term of the bill. There are many good things that could be said about DREE, and many success stories could be quoted in all parts of the country as to the beneficial effect of the application of this statute. So I do not wish it to be understood by any that I am opposed to the principle and the thrust behind the Regional Development Incentives Act. I am not. It is a good principle.

I may also say that the pedigree of this idea probably goes back to the administration of the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. I recall his particular concern for the need of the Atlantic provinces of Canada to receive the fraternal support of their fellow citizens in the rest of the country. As time rolled by, the names were changed and the bills received different titles, but the principle was the same, that we were going to use our collective effort to improve the economic circumstances of other people in our country who would be entitled to that kind of help.

The question of the co-ordination of the federal administration of DREE and the provincial administrations, most of whom, if not all, run similar programs, is an important consideration. My impression so far is that there is remarkably good co-ordination between the federal administration and the provinces in this connection, and that DREE has gone to some effort to decentralize its activities to ensure that that kind of association is encouraged and developed.

So all in all I would say to honourable senators that I shall certainly vote for the bill. I think it is a good thing that the term of its life has been shortened, and I have some confidence that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which is seized of the matter under its very able Chairman, Senator Everett, will in due course produce some recommendations for the consideration of this house that will make this policy even more effective in the country.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I realize that we are running against time and there is a great deal to be done in the next few days if we are going to be able to recess before the end of the month. However, I should like to say a few words about this bill, as I have more than a passing interest in it.

His Honour the Speaker was the first minister of DREE in the Government of Canada, and I am sure he will recall I was the first minister of DREE in the Government of Newfoundland. I believe I had the honour of being one of the first to sign a DREE agreement, on behalf of the Province of Newfoundland, with the federal government.

Prior to that, as Senator Roblin has said, there were a number of programs which envisaged the DREE as we know it today. Sequentially there was the so-called FRED program. I have forgotten the full title from which that acronym was derived, but it was a program specifically designed to try to remove some of the inequities which existed in Canada. Prior to that there was the ARDA program and, before that, as Senator Roblin pointed out, there were a number of federal programs, not the least of which was the Roads to Resources Program initiated by the Diefenbaker government, which was also designed basically to relieve some of the inequities that existed across Canada. There were also a number of other programs.

We can all disagree on the details of the DREE program and, indeed, of the other federal-provincial programs initiated in the last 20 years or so. However, a person would have to be biased, short-sighted or, frankly, stupid to argue, as some have done—and they are not confined to any one political party—that the DREE program has been virtually useless. The DREE program has worked miracles in certain parts of Canada. Those of us who belong to the Atlantic provinces can point out specific example after example where the DREE program has transformed areas that formerly had known only privation, poverty and isolation, since one aspect of the DREE program has been the building of highways.

Senator Thériault, in his brief but very able introduction of this amendment, pointed out two of its essential characteristics. One is that it is important to continue programs such as DREE if we are going to see Confederation continue as many of us envisage it. Certainly, we in Newfoundland, who worked to join with Canada and to become a part of the Confederation process, must have programs of this kind, and they must not be rigid; they must be flexible because what is a disadvantaged area today may be a prosperous area tomorrow. I can remember, as a young man, when the most prosperous part of Canada today, the province of Alberta, was certainly not prosperous by any stretch of the imagination. The transformation that has taken place in Alberta in recent years could very well take place in other parts of Canada. In fact, it has already done so, although not so spectacularly. In the not too distant future, we may very well see a transformation of that kind in eastern Canada, particularly in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and perhaps all of eastern Canada, if the oil potential that we believe is there is realized.

The second important point made by Senator Thériault is that there must be some continuity and some logical plan. In Canada we all look forward with anticipation to the promised revision of the DREE legislation.

As I listened to Senator Thériault yesterday, and to Senator Roblin today, I was reminded of the famous dialogue contained in the latter part of Plato's dialogues where Socrates has a debate with one of his pupils on education and, as usual, there was disagreement on details. Socrates summed it up by saying that we may disagree on details; we have the right to do that, but we have to remember this: Education is a good thing and a necessary thing, and it is a duty of us all to support it. This great concept of removing regional disparity is, in my mind, implicit in DREE and is the very heart of Confederation. We have to remember that it is a good thing and it is our duty to support it.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Thériault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I listened very carefully to what Senator Roblin said, and I want to assure him that every point he made was a good one except, perhaps, the one in which he mentioned the name of Mr. Diefenbaker. However, now that he has passed on, I cannot see any harm in it.

Senator Walker: That is not funny.

Senator Thériault: It is not funny because I remember the day when there were hodge-podge ad hoc programs introduced on the spur of the moment until the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with His Honour the Speaker as minister.

Senator Roblin is right in saying that the reason for the extension being cut from five years to three years is because the members of the other house—and I think rightly so—want to be assured of a chance to review the whole program before the dissolution of this Parliament. I can tell Senator Roblin and other senators that I have a letter in my hand from the minister assuring this house of his entire co-operation and that of his officials in the higher echelons, and saying that they are at our disposal to discuss this matter and to hear our views. I hope that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which has undertaken a review of regional disparities, will advance some proposals and suggestions for a better and stronger department to the minister and his officials in order that they may convince the government of the importance of this department to the poorer parts of this country.

I am sure that all honourable senators are prepared to co-operate, and that this bill can proceed to third reading, with leave, now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, as I suggested I would earlier, I move, with leave, that this bill be now read a third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILLS TO AMEND—SECOND READINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to consider Orders 4 to 17 together:

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill C-268, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint Hyacinthe-Bagot); Bill C-402, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sarnia-Lambton); Bill C-488, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Rimouski-Temiscouata); Bill C-529, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington); Bill C-565, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Notre Dame de Grâce-Lachine East); Bill C-599, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Berthier Maskinongé-Lanaudière); Bill C-600, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Cochrane-Superior); Bill C-601, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Argenteuil-Papineau); Bill C-602, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Verdun-Saint Paul); Bill C-604, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Sainte Marie); Bill C-605, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Mercier); Bill C-606, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Richmond-Wolfe); Bill C-608, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montmorency-Orléans); and Bill C-609, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (La Prairie).

● (1530)

He said: First I thank honourable senators for allowing consideration of these bills en bloc, which is the way they were considered in the other place. I must follow that with an apology for the fact that we did not get copies of each bill printed for consideration today, because I suspect that some senators will want to refer to individual bills. Whether my suspicion is correct or not, as a matter of form they ought to be available for honourable senators to have that opportunity even if they decide not to seize it.

For that reason, I propose at this stage simply to suggest some reasons for favourable consideration for this block of bills, and then someone on the other side might wish to adjourn the debate. We could then deal with them by way of questions or comments. In any event, I propose, no matter how we proceed, to make some observations about them today.

[Senator Thériault.]

Honourable senators, each of these bills changes the name of an electoral district. The name to be changed was the name that was established during the last revision of the electoral boundaries and so persisted. They were the designations of those constituencies during the last election.

The reasons for the change of names do not appear in any detail in explanatory notes or otherwise for those constituencies with which I am personally familiar.

For those constituencies with which I am personally familiar I can see in many cases that the members of the House of Commons representing those constituencies feel that the names proposed more accurately describe the regions or areas that make up the constituencies they represent. That analysis is supported by the fact that in no case that I have noticed is the name of the constituency shortened; rather, in all cases it is lengthened. For example, there is before you a bill to change the name of the electoral district of Sarnia, and it is proposed that it be changed to Sarnia-Lambton. I am familiar with that constituency and I know that the County of Lambton lies just to the east of Sarnia and to the west of the County of Middlesex. There is a riding called Lambton-Middlesex and the border runs right down the middle of Lambton. I take it that the member for Sarnia wishes to make it clear that his riding consists of a good portion of the County of Lambton. I take it that that is an example of the motivation behind the suggested changes for names.

Honourable senators will notice that in one case, for example, Montreal is added to make it clear that a constituency is found in Montreal, although the name the constituency presently has would not disclose that fact.

I have no other information. I have not been individually briefed by the members of the House of Commons on why they want the names of these constituencies changed.

Here in the Senate, of course, except for Quebec senators, members of the Senate to not represent constituencies as such, but provinces. Quebec senators represent electoral divisions.

The blandishment that I hope will be successful in encouraging honourable senators do give quick approval to these bills is that this is something we are being asked to do by some of our colleagues in the other branch of Parliament, for reasons that I am sure are sufficient to them. I am equally sure that, in reverse circumstances, they would do the same for us.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

BANK ACT
QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is quite direct in form and simple in language. Its purpose is simply to extend the charters of the banks in Canada to November 30, 1980. It will do this whether the banks come under the provisions of the Bank Act or of the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

The reason is quite simple. The charters of the banks under the existing legislation expire on July 14. Consequently, they would no longer be chartered, were we to do nothing about it. This is, thus, a simple, direct provision to extend that term to November 30 next. I regret very much having to ask the Senate to pass such a measure, because it will be the fourth time we have had to extend the Bank Act in order to enable Parliament to get on with its revision.

● (1540)

By way of background, the revision process was started in 1976. It first appeared before the Senate in the form of Bill C-15, I think, and at a later time in the form of Bill C-14. It is now before Parliament in the form of Bill C-6.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has already done a great deal of work on the proposed revision of the Bank Act since it was first brought forward in 1976. I am happy to say that much of the work of that committee has been reflected in the bills which have replaced the original bill. As a matter of fact, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is meeting on this matter at this very moment.

Bill C-6 is before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the House of Commons. There are some amendments proposed to the existing bill. Of course, the Senate committee is studying the bill in anticipation of the Senate's receiving it, and in anticipation of its being referred to that committee.

I do not think there is anything more I can add. It is a self-evident problem. I commend the bill to the house.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I wish to join with my honourable and distinguished friend in supporting second reading of this bill. I should say that it is through no one's fault that this extension is required. Two elections have intervened which held up the passage of this very tortuous bill to revise the Bank Act and to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and so forth.

I have nothing further to say on the matter. The less said the better and the sooner we can get on with our job.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am in your hands, but I would ask leave of the Senate to move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJUSTMENT OF ACCOUNTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill C-22, to adjust the Accounts of Canada and to make related amendments to certain Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to make some comments on Bill C-22, to adjust the accounts of Canada. This bill is rather lengthy and a bit complicated, but the purpose of it is to implement a number of recommendations concerning technical accounting improvements to the Government of Canada's financial statements and to write off certain loans and other accounts.

In 1973, the Secretary of the Treasury Board undertook to implement a study of the accounts of Canada to resolve several technical accounting issues which had been discussed over the years in the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons, and raised by successive Auditors General. The study was completed in October 1975. Its 41 recommendations were accepted by the Treasury Board and by the cabinet, and were submitted to and approved by the Public Accounts Committee in March 1976.

Recommendations 10, 11 and 12 of the report, which are the primary subjects of this bill, redefine what constitutes an asset or liability of the Government of Canada. To meet this new definition, it will be necessary to write off certain items previously classified as assets, recognizing that in future they will be treated as expenditures rather than assets.

A three-stage technique has to be used to implement the necessary changes. In stage I, to reflect the changes in the government's financial statements at March 31, 1979, the Minister of Finance has exercised his authority under section 54(2) of the Financial Administration Act to "establish such reserves with respect to the assets and liabilities of Canada," as he feels are required to give a true and fair view of Canada's financial position. Stage II is the application of the portion of this bill which removes the legislative authority for the various accounts, funds and loans that are to be deleted. Stage III will be the application of the portion of this bill to delete amounts outstanding in the accounts of Canada as at March 31, 1981. Most of the deletion arises from the Unemployment Insurance Fund and the Airports Revolving Fund.

The exact amounts to be deleted will not be known until the actual balances at March 31, 1981 are established. The $3.8 billion estimate of the balance to be deleted that was quoted in the government release of April 29, 1980, was based on figures published in the Public Accounts for 1978-79. Since the press release, preliminary figures for the year 1979-80 have become available from the year-end accounting records and the estimate of the amount to be deleted can now be revised down to $3 billion. This change occurred because the government's cost of paying benefits to the Unemployment Insurance Fund was reduced by about $1 billion in fiscal year 1979-80 from what it was in 1978-79. This reduction in the government's cost of paying benefits was due to a new formula that increased the share of costs to employees and employers, reduced benefits paid because of some new rules, and a slight improvement in the rate of unemployment.

The objectives of this bill could have been met through special supplementary estimates followed by a special appropriation act, but because they are accounting adjustments rather than spending initiatives, and because they represent a significant change in accounting policy, it was felt that they would be better explained through a separate act. In keeping with this philosophy, it was decided to include in this bill only those items which had previously been agreed to and publicly acknowledged in the Financial Statements of Canada. Note 3 of the 1979 Public Accounts relates to recommendations 10, 11 and 12 of the study of the accounts, and to the write-off of certain loans which are included in this bill. A more detailed explanation of the major items is provided in the following paragraphs.

Unemployment Insurance: The largest amount involved relates to the Unemployment Insurance Account. At March 31, 1980 advances by the government and other current obligations to this fund were in the order of $1.6 billion. The advances to the Unemployment Insurance Account made by the government, to meet the expected cash requirements of the account at March 31, 1980, totalled $1,025 million.

A calculation was made of the government's cost of paying benefits for the calendar year 1979, plus January to March 1980. This total cost exceeded the advances by $574 million and is an obligation of the government to the Unemployment Insurance Account. The total amount of the required adjustment, therefore, is $1,025 million, plus $574 million, for a total of $1,599 million.

This adjustment has the effect of recognizing the government's total cost of paying benefits to the Unemployment Insurance Account up to March 31, 1980, and more adequately discloses the government's expenditures. Bill C-22 will obviate the need to make this kind of adjustment in the future since the proposed act will require that the government recognize as budgetary expenditures its cost of paying benefits to the Unemployment Insurance Account on a monthly basis.

The next largest amount involved relates to revolving funds and working capital advances. Under the present accounting method, the additional moneys provided by appropriations over revenues collected were treated as loans or advances, rather than expenditures of the government. The new method will recognize "advances" as budgetary expenditures at the time they occur, instead of treating them as non-budgetary loans. It is now necessary to delete the outstanding balances of all such accounts effective March 31, 1981, and that is one of the purposes of the bill. The total of these balances as at March 31, 1980 was $859 million, and they involved some 56 separate accounts belonging to 17 different departments.

The only significant addition in Bill C-22 over its predecessor, Bill C-13, is that part coming under the heading "Authorization for Certain Revolving Funds" and comprising clauses 22 to 33. Generally, parliamentary authority for revolving funds not originally authorized in specific legislation would be approved or rescinded through supplementary estimates. However, because of difficulties associated with co-ordination and timing between supplementary estimates in fiscal year 1980-81 and Bill C-22, it was considered appropriate to include the rescinding of all previous revolving fund authorities and to establish new revolving funds in this bill. It is intended that future amendments to the revolving fund authorities set up by this bill will receive parliamentary authority through supplementary estimates. Consequently, a special clause is included in this bill to facilitate amendment by an appropriation act.

Another amount to be adjusted relates to unamortized bond flotation costs. The balance of unamortized flotation costs of $140 million for bond issues prior to 1977 needs to be deleted from the Accounts of Canada.

A fourth major item to be adjusted arises from loans totalling $387 million made to finance certain types of capital expenditures for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Capital Commission, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. Payments of principal and interest on these loans have not been made since March 31, 1975, the reason being that, commencing on that date, any new capital expenditures have been treated as normal budgetary expenditures of the government. These old loan balances have continued to be carried as assets in the Accounts of Canada pending the granting of parliamentary authority to delete and recognize them as expenditures.

In addition to these assets there are also some liabilities of the government that must be removed to correct the accounting and improve the accountability to Parliament. These special accounts, previously shown as liabilities in the Public Accounts, were in essence special accounts where the agency concerned deposited its appropriation and revenue accrued through sales in order that these funds not lapse at the end of the fiscal year.

In conclusion, it is emphasized that this bill does not propose any new expenditures of cash. The bill seeks to implement recommendations of the Study of the Accounts of Canada approved by the Treasury Board and the cabinet of the previous government, and which have been endorsed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, as I rise to speak on Bill C-22, to adjust the Accounts of Canada and to make related amendments to certain acts, I do so in the knowledge that this bill has been agreed to by all members of the other place and now comes to us with minor amendments.

Bill C-22 can technically be called a housekeeping bill since what it does, in effect, is to correct a group of accounting errors, and it results in the treating of some amounts of public expenditure as expenditures and removing them from listings of assets in the Public Accounts, where they have been year after year.

To be able to accept the writing-off of approximately $4 billion as housekeeping or accounting adjustments, or errors in bookkeeping, demonstrates how fully we have come to accept the magnitude of the amounts of money being moved about by governments in this present era.

Bill C-22 is a move in the right direction, at least as far as proper accountability of government to Parliament is concerned. It is quite obvious to all of us that expenditures should be treated as expenditures. The moneys have been spent, and we should not be told that they are recoverable loans or advances. This is particularly true of the amounts advanced by the government to cover claims paid by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, a subject mentioned earlier. These are statutory obligations of the Government of Canada, and why they should be called advances or loans on a year-to-year basis escapes me.

Perhaps in closing the debate on the motion for second reading, the sponsor of the bill in the Senate could provide us with some information on the writing-off of the loan to the CBC. This is a mystery, but I am sure there is a reasonable explanation for it. The people of Canada, through the government, pick up the deficits or losses of the CBC, and why this particular amount should be written off while we pick up the losses further down the road is something of a mystery. Perhaps we could be given an explanation of that at some point in time.

The Study of the Public Accounts of Canada was commissioned in 1973, with the report being tabled in 1975, and we only now have a bill before the Parliament to correct the obvious. There are many other areas in the Public Accounts which are, to be charitable, in error, or at least suspect, and I alluded earlier to one such area, that being pension fundings. There are contingent liabilities in the Public Accounts which are not covered properly; there are loans to foreign countries which are listed as assets and which, in reasonable and responsible accounting, should not be called assets of the Government of Canada or the people of Canada. There are many other areas in the Public Accounts which probably should be looked at in a far more serious light than they have been hitherto.

It is vital to the people of Canada, to the accounting principles of Canada, and to the responsibility of the public that a reasonably detailed accounting be made to Parliament in respect of the amounts of money that are spent. These bookkeeping sleights of hand should really be put aside. They are beneath the dignity of Parliament.

Perhaps the recent appointment of a permanent Comptroller General might go a long way toward correcting these things. I hope that the gentleman gets the co-operation he will need to make the necessary improvements and corrections. In any event, since this bill will add a further $4 billion to the true national debt of the country—and this we have done in the past two days—it does demonstrate the obvious shortcomings in our accounting system, and perhaps it is time to commission another study of the accounting system in place in Canada. The last full study was done around 1920, and we had this partial one in 1973 resulting in the half dozen or so improvements included in this bill. Perhaps the time has come to recommend a detailed upgrading and remodelling of the accounting system in place in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I inquire whether it is the intention of the sponsor to refer the bill to the National Finance Committee.

Senator Barrow: That was not my intention.

Senator Roblin: May I suggest that that might be advisable. It is a very complicated bill and there is a lot in it. I, for one, would recommend that it be referred to the National Finance Committee for examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you making a motion?

Senator Roblin: I operate as always on the principle of persuasion. I am trying to persuade my honourable friends to adopt the idea as their own.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just as Senator Roblin would like a committee to consider the bill, I would like to consider his proposal that it go to committee, and have a chance to speak to the chairman of the committee with reference to the time schedule. Otherwise I agree in principle with Senator Roblin, and would ask the sponsor of the bill to stand it or to move that it receive third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, and we can make inquiries in the meantime.

Senator Barrow: I move that it stand until the next sitting.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could not just allow the matter to stand without reference to third reading, because once that is on the record then that becomes and order of the house. I appreciate my honourable friend's desire to consult, and I certainly agree with that. Perhaps the best way would be just to allow the matter to stand. It has been suggested that the mover of the motion for second reading should move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Barrow: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Barrow, debate adjourned.

SALTFISH ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau moved the second reading of Bill C-7, to amend the Saltfish Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-7 is legislation to amend the Saltfish Act, an act under which the Canadian Saltfish Corporation has been granted a monopoly of the trade in cured codfish produced in Newfoundland and Labrador and on the lower north shore of Quebec. There are two provinces involved here, and each province has supporting legislation.

The purpose of Bill C-7 is to increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation from $15 million to $30 million. The $15 million ceiling has been sufficient for the corporation in past years—sometimes lean years, when we consider the mid-1970s. But conditions have changed since that time and the Atlantic fisheries are now prospering, particularly because we now have control over our fish stock in the 200-mile zone. Foreign fishing fleets which had depleted our stocks are now being restricted, and cod stocks are being rebuilt. This means, of course, that we now have more fish and this is particularly true with the northern cod stocks. Our scientists foresee a great increase in the supply of saltfish products, especially from the northern cod stocks which were so heavily overfished by foreign ships until 1977.

In 1970 when the Canadian Saltfish Corporation was established, its borrowing ceiling was $10 million. By 1976 this amount was insufficient and the ceiling was raised to $15 million, but with the expected increase in codfish this amount will not adequately service the demand for borrowing that is anticipated.

Projections by our scientists show that codfish landings from both inshore and near-shore operations alone would be more than 200,000 tonnes by 1985 or earlier in Newfoundland alone. That is not taking into account the Quebec catch nor does it take into account our offshore fleet. If there is a substantial catch there, the total amount would be twice what we are now landing.

Almost everyone agrees that the present markets made up chiefly of those in the United States are not flexible enough for a supply of that size in frozen product forms, and this also applies to other potential markets. We have, of course, the alternative to those frozen products in the form of cured codfish. There are many private firms that make up the frozen fish sector of the industry in Newfoundland, and they foresee cured codfish as the alternative.

The country is now looking for new markets in codfish products. Some of these markets are in southern Europe, in countries which had their own home-based fleets in Canadian waters before we declared our 200-mile zone in 1977. Some of these countries are familiar with cured codfish, and like the product. If the present projections are valid—and we believe they are—it will be necessary to double the salt and dried cod production over the next five years which would amount to approximately 20,000 tonnes per year.

Honourable senators, I am sure you recognize that these figures mean a large increase in the amount of borrowing that will be required by the corporation to meet the new demands placed on it. Codfish production will be double its present volume by the mid-1980s. In addition to that there is an increase in the price of raw materials and processing charges which amount to some 5 or 6 per cent per year, and, as is the case in most businesses, inflation, of course, has added to the corporation's problems.

The volume of product flow will require adequate storage capacity, and working capital will be needed to purchase and handle the expanded production into the mid-1980s. The corporation supplies salt to fishermen and advance loans to outfit boats and obtain fishing gear. The peak borrowing needs for working capital usually occur in October, and it is important that this legislation be passed before that time.

The corporation engages private firms as its agents to assemble, process and store the supply of cod which it handles.

[Senator Cottreau.]

During the time of decline of the codfish resources in the 1970s, prior to Canada's declaration of the 200-mile zone, it was the corporation that kept many of these firms alive. Many of the fishermen living along the Quebec north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence have a great dependence on the corporation. They fish from isolated communities in small open boats, and rely on the cod fishery for the greater part of their living. Since 1971 the corporation has been the only purchaser of salt cod produced on the north shore, thus playing an important part in the economic stability of the area.

The corporation is a non-profit organization, and over the past seven years its aggressive marketing policy has meant an increase of more than 200 per cent in the price of salted fish paid to the small boat fishermen.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I hope this bill will meet with your approval and that you will give it your wholehearted support so that the act can be amended and the corporation's borrowing ceiling raised to $30 million.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am pleased to reply to the introduction of Bill C-7 by Senator Cottreau, and to congratulate him on his succinct explanation of the bill which, as he indicated, would increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation from $15 million to $30 million. To one who has read the debates in the other place on the bill, it is obvious there was general agreement on its passage. It was first introduced by the previous administration under the Minister of Fisheries, the Honourable James McGrath, who, on behalf of the official opposition two days ago, gave approval to increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, and the bill passed all stages in a very short period of time.

Having followed the activities of the corporation since its establishment in 1970, I have no hesitation in suggesting that we in this house should pass the bill without referral to a committee, in the interests of the segment of the fishing industry that will continue to benefit.

Honourable senators, one does not hear too much about saltfish these days, but, as reflected in the need to double the borrowing authority, it has become a very important export commodity for Newfoundland and Quebec. The product has had its ups and downs over the years. Not too many years ago the inshore fishermen, isolated from the markets by outmoded methods and painstaking labour, had to cut, split and dry the codfish, and sell or barter the product for a few pennies per pound, or indeed keep it for food.

Salt cod was traditionally considered an inexpensive food. However, the steady increase in raw fish prices, the changing trend from fishermen's produced fish to agent's produced fish, thus causing extra cost, the increased cost of salt and other means of processing, have changed this concept, and saltfish has, as have other fish products, become considerably more costly. It is still, however, a very good buy considering the food value.

Certain markets are already showing some resistance to increased prices, and therefore the corporation must obtain more raw material of proper quality and large size for the more lucrative markets in order to remain viable and to increase its influence and volume in the more desirable markets.

As Senator Cottreau mentioned, the Canadian Saltfish Corporation was established in 1970 and given the monopoly over the trade in saltfish produced in Newfoundland and Labrador, as well as the lower north shore of Quebec. I must say, honourable senators, that today it is one of the few successful crown corporations, and I feel it appropriate to pay a tribute to its first and founding president, Mr. Arden Maloney, who has been responsible for the steady progress of the corporation, which has done much for the inshore fishermen in the province of Newfoundland.

One of the obstacles the corporation encountered was difficulty in obtaining sufficient quantities of saltfish for export markets. This was due to the increase in the price to fishermen of fresh cod. Instead of going through the painstaking process of processing it, they were able to sell it to the buyer at a pretty good price, and this made it easier for the fishermen to dispose of their fresh cod, instead of going through that process of drying.

It is interesting to note that since the corporation was set up sales have increased from $6.8 million in 1971 to $24 million in 1979, and it is expected that this figure will grow even more, hence the need to increase the borrowing authority.

Certainly an aspect that will affect its growth is the fact that with the recovery of fish stocks, the United States, which at one time took between 80 and 85 per cent of our fresh frozen product, is now taking advantage of the lucrative fishing grounds, and they will not now require as much of our fresh fish, so it is to Canada's advantage, through the corporation, to encourage the processing of saltfish and improve its marketability.

The other problem with which the corporation was faced had to do with the quality of the product, to meet competition from other countries, such as Iceland and Norway, which enjoy tariff-free entry to the European Economic Community.

The quality problem tends to be defined in certain markets, but now one of the trends is that they are looking for a larger fish, so we have to be interested in the size. This is the sort of product which is attractive to consumers in the importing countries, the trend being to dried heavy salted codfish, which is a rather new product. For example, Puerto Rico continued to be the corporation's most important market, although more emphasis is put on expanding other markets by penetrating the countries where it previously sold little or nothing.

In this respect, the corporation is now reasonably well established in the Italian market with dried heavy salted codfish, which is a rather new product in that market. This market previously only bought from Canada the traditional light salted codfish. The corporation's re-entry into the Spanish market for heavy salted dried fish appears to be an established fact.

The corporation also continues to hold its position in the northern part of Brazil. Its position in the West Indies is solid in some islands but insecure in others, due basically to internal politics and depressed living standards.

It is therefore important that one of the priority objectives of the corporation should now be to continue to find new markets and to improve the quality of its product.

The corporation also continues to be hampered by a large proportion of small fish and very few large and extra large. Although there appears to have been some improvement in quality, there is still a long way to go, even ignoring the problems of small and extra small trap codfish. Little can be done about this because of fishing methods. Fishermen's split and cured fish continues to be of generally better quality than fish split by machines in the plant. The lack of large fish prohibits the corporation from entering such lucrative markets as southern Brazil, and also expanding to a greater extent in markets such as Spain, Portugal and Italy.

Another problem has to do with the selling prices, which, although higher than last year, did not increase to the same extent as prices for fresh and frozen fish. Most of the corporation's contracts were in United States funds, and thus it enjoyed a beneficial currency exchange rate.

All in all, the corporation has done a reasonably adequate job, in taking a product which was confined to little areas of Newfoundland and northern Quebec, and establishing markets which can continue to grow to the benefit of the fishermen in those provinces.

I feel it is vitally important that the corporation be allowed to extend its borrowing authority, and I have no hesitation in recommending that the bill receive second and third readings and be passed today.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau moved with leave, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be now read the third time.

LIVESTOCK FEED ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 25, the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill C-15, to amend the Livestock Feed Assistance Act.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, in speaking to Bill C-15 I would say, first, that my party endorses, within the context of this act, the principle that northern Canada should enjoy benefits comparable to eastern Canada and British Columbia. Accordingly, we on this side will support Bill C-15.

In my remarks, I should first address the incongruity that the north should not have been accorded, when the act was first introduced, assistance similar to that available elsewhere in Canada. Certainly, the Progressive Conservative Party has been on record for some years as endorsing the extension of the Livestock Feed Assistance Act to the north. The Yukon Territorial Council long ago requested such an extension. Finally, it took the intervention of the Department of Northern Affairs to persuade this government, in the dying days of its previous incarnation, to introduce such a measure. True to our commitment, we reintroduced Bill C-9, but enjoyed too little time in office to secure its passage. We are pleased that this government has seen fit to smile graciously upon northern Canada so early into its mandate.

Let no honourable senator be misled as to the impact of this act. The government will pay approximately 30 per cent of the transportation costs of livestock feed to northern Canada, amounting to about $50 per metric ton on a current transportation cost of $160 per metric ton. Inasmuch as cheaper access to feed engenders the development of a local livestock industry, northerners will benefit both from cheaper and fresher food being available. It is hoped, of course, that shipment of the feed will contribute to the establishment of a local grain industry. There are 3,000 to 4,000 square miles that have the capacity to produce grain for forage in the north, and with summer daylight hours as long as they are, the potential for growth, if cultivation takes place, is impressive.

There are, however, problems which arise from the extension of this policy. The government will have to monitor its application to ensure that local grain growers are not undercut by an influx of cheaper grain. The government, to give effect to its policy, will also have to improve transportation and distribution systems in the north. They are woefully poor at the moment, causing an official of the Livestock Feed Board, appearing before a committee of the other place, to admit that it may be necessary to truck grains in from Alberta, as the existing transportation system might be unable to accommodate the increased demand.

Honourable senators, in the light of these facts, it would be very unfortunate if the government were to decide, upon passage of this bill, that it had done its bit for the development of northern agriculture. Certainly the government has studied to death the future of agriculture in northern Canada. One could almost argue that had they long ago introduced the comprehensive policy which is so desperately needed, the bill which we are debating today would be unnecessary.

It is regrettable that in some respects Liberal policy has directly worked against the prosperity of northern agriculture. Certainly the closing of certain Department of Agriculture experimental stations in the north has lent that appearance. So what the government must do is put into effect a program which would realize the potential for production in the area, as part of an overall assistance package. In fact, the government once received a request from the Yukon Council not to proceed with this bill until an overall northern agricultural policy had been proclaimed.

It is now time that this piecemeal approach end. A comprehensive package must address those transportation and distribution problems to which I have already referred. It must also strive to assist in the creation of an early self-sufficient northern agricultural industry, and in doing so the government will absolutely have to permit the development of agricultural and recreational land in the territories.

The previous government, sympathetic to the aspirations and desires of northern Canadians, had taken some of the wraps off of such development, effective this summer. The new Liberal administration has decided not to proceed in this regard.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Sherwood: While sharing your concerns about the rapidity of development, we believe that northerners deserve the opportunity to more closely meet their own demands with local produce, and we believe that outstanding concerns can be met through the judicious application of regulations. Realistically, honourable senators, if development of the north does not become a priority of this government, then such harmless legislation as we are now debating will have very little impact upon the achievement of its stated goals.

With the indulgence of honourable senators, I would like to tackle one final but very fundamental problem arising from the introduction of this bill. It is a matter which I fear either the government has failed to consider, or, alternatively, has already passed judgment upon, to the detriment of western Canada.

To paraphrase the Minister of Agriculture, this program is designed to tide each region over until it becomes self-sufficient in livestock, and hence forage, production. To that end, the province of Quebec benefited last year from $4.5 million in federal funding under this act. The maritime provinces received almost $4 million, while British Columbia got $4.6 million. So-called "top-loading" subsidies by more prosperous provinces, designed to enhance still further the development of local livestock industries, have caused an even greater proportion of the livestock industry to move from western Canada to other parts of the country.

The point I wish to make, honourable senators, is that while the extension of the provisions of this act to the north is the only equitable way to proceed, given that other regions of the country are benefiting perhaps the rationale for the act itself should come under closer scrutiny. Since the inception of the Canadian Livestock Feed Assistance Board in 1967, western Canada's proportion both of the livestock and slaughterhouse industries has declined considerably. While the differential has narrowed, freight rates still heavily encourage the movement of unprocessed or semi-processed foodstuffs from west to east. The west still pays a transportation premium for finished products travelling in the other direction. While other regions are benefiting from self-sufficiency, or are approximating that objective, the west's competitive advantage in livestock production has been reduced.

I hasten to add that this would not be a problem if the government had policies in place designed to promote regional self-sufficiency in every endeavour. Allowing that such an objective would be ridiculous and counterproductive in terms of our international competitive position, I nevertheless point out that I have seen no federal policies designed to equalize automobile or textile manufacture across our regions.

Accordingly, I would urge the government, given the era of renewed federalism which has dawned upon this country, to review the overall impact of programs such as this, which may, quite understandably, contribute to the alienation which exists today in western Canada. At the very least, the inclusion of some western representation on the board's advisory committee would be a start.

• (1630)

With that request for the sort of fundamental review for which this government is not particularly known, yet expressing my sincere hope that a few months in opposition has increased its sensitivity, I conclude my remarks by reiterating our support for the passage of Bill C-15.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in Senator Hays' name, I move, with leave, that this bill be read a third time now.

Senator Roblin: Is it not the intention to refer this bill to committee?

Senator Frith: The Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Senator Hays, and the Vice-Chairman, Senator Sherwood, consulted on that possibility. There was a time when they thought they would like that to happen in order to have a review of the whole principle as suggested by Senator Sherwood. After further discussion, they decided they would postpone that to some other occasion. Therefore, they do not feel it is necessary for this bill to be referred to committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Friday, June 27, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the report be now adopted.

He said: As honourable senators may remember, about a month ago the joint chairman, Senator Godfrey, presented a report on the same subject matter as the present report which, incidentally, may be found in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 27 at page 221. At that time the terms of the report were much broader than, apparently, had been the intention of the committee. The subject of the report was authorization to send members of the joint committee to a meeting of the committees on Subordinate Legislation of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth to be held in Canberra, Australia, from September 29 to October 3, 1980.

The original report asked for authority to send members of the committee to Australia and elsewhere, as I remember. Although I am not quoting the report verbatim, that was its meaning. The Senate, as you will remember, asked that the matter be referred back to committee for reconsideration. The committee has now reconsidered, and has presented the report which, as I have said, appears at page 221 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and which is before honourable senators today.

The substance of the committee's report is as follows:

> That it be given authority to send five (5) members of the Committee and one (1) Committee Counsel to the conference of the committees on Subordinate Legislation of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth to be held in Canberra, Australia from September 29 to October 3, 1980.

Honourable senators will recall that under rule 83sca the actual expenses of such a trip if the report is adopted by the Senate, are subject to examination by the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

July 10, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 10th day of July, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-40, to amend the Pension Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that the bill be read a second time later this day.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is this the bill demanded by the Honourable Stanley Knowles?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): So they say. We do not say that, but they do.

An Hon. Senator: We should not trust rumours.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It follows upon a delayed answer he gave to a question I asked on June 25. The minister asserted:

> It is the intention of this government to negotiate better operation of the auto pact, and while it is not desired, nor is there any intention, to seek a total renegotiation of the pact, there will be some changes to it.

May I ask the minister what assurances he has that there will be changes in the auto pact? Have the U.S. authorities agreed in principle to such changes or is this just wishful thinking on the part of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? If they have agreed in principle on certain changes, might we know what areas these changes will cover?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not engage in wishful thinking; he is very sincere in negotiating an improvement in the auto pact. Although I cannot now inform my friend on the state of those negotiations, I will find out whether there is any more precise information than I have given him. The minister was in Washington the same day that I was there and there were negotiations going on for most of the day. Specifically, with respect to my friend's inquiry about what changes the United States has agreed to, if indeed any changes have been agreed to at this point in time, I think I had better obtain a report from the minister.

• (1410)

Senator Charbonneau: If I may ask a supplementary, is the minister telling us that changes have been agreed to at this specific time?

Senator Olson: All the minister said, and I understood it quite clearly, was that he was going to make an inquiry about the matter.

UNITED STATES—PRESIDENTIAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF ASSISTANCE TO AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to address another question to the minister relating to the automobile industry. It arises out of the announcement made by President Carter the other day of rather massive assistance of various kinds to the automobile industry in the United States.

While I am not suggesting that a program of that kind would necessarily be appropriate here, I did want to ask what the Minister of State for Economic Development is doing in conjunction with the industry, and perhaps with concerned provincial governments, to develop a longer-term strategy for this industry, since I think he will agree, as most people would, that the problems in the industry are not simply temporary or cyclical in nature.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure the Honourable Senator Murray knows quite well that the Minister of State for Economic Development does not administer any department, or, indeed, any program. Nor is he attempting to run any other minister's department.

Senator Flynn: Then what does he do?

Senator Olson: He has enough to do.

Senator Walker: Just answer the question.

Senator Olson: The function now of the Minister of State for Economic Development, as was the case during the time of my predecessor, is to perform a co-ordinating role in making sure that the economic policies of all the economic departments are co-ordinated in advance—

Senator Flynn: It doesn't show!

Senator Olson: —and, indeed, to follow that up with the expenditure management section, for which I wish to compliment my predecessor who put it in place, to make sure that those policies are carried out according to the will of the committee of which the minister is chairman.

Senator Murray: I am sorry, but that simply will not do for an answer, because if there is a classic case in which the plight of an industry is the concern of several departments of government, all of them falling under the aegis of economic development, it is this one.

I simply put the question to the minister whether, in his co-ordinating role, he is not bringing together the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for example, Finance, for example, and several others that are members of his committee, to try to work out a longer-term strategy for this industry. It seems to me that this is a classic case for the concern of a minister charged with co-ordinating economic policy.

Without being personally offensive in any way, I must say that if the minister persists in this kind of answer I will suggest that we ask for some kind of written documentation before this body so that we can know whether the Ministry of State for Economic Development is in fact an effective working portfolio or whether it is simply an empty title.

Senator Perrault: Very effective! Very effective!

Senator Olson: Honourable Senator Murray has that option open to him any time he wants to take it, and I hope he will not refrain from taking the option because of any admonitions from me, if he feels he ought to do so.

I can tell him, however, and I find it rather difficult that he does not seem to understand even the simplest language, that I am not running the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I have no intention of attempting to usurp that position now or ever.

There is a co-ordinating role at times that the Minister of State for Economic Development can play, and he is playing it—

Senator Perrault: Very well!

Senator Olson: —and will continue to play it on a low-profile basis, because he is not running and is not going to appear to run any other minister's department, either. I cannot understand why my friend cannot understand that. It is simple and straightforward, and there are no weasel words in that reply.

• (1415)

Senator Murray: I put it to the minister, then, that he is denying responsibility for the automobile industry, except as a matter of collective responsibility as a minister of the Crown; and that as Minister of State for Economic Development he is saying that he has no responsibility for developing a strategy in that area.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that interpretation of what I said would have exactly the same kind of credibility as, I suppose, the honourable member's interpretation of how to run the Conservative campaign—and he knows the results.

Senator Perrault: They ran out of gas.

Senator Smith: There is no danger of the honourable gentleman's running out of gas.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

HIRING OF CONVICTED WATERGATE CONSPIRATOR

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. In its issue of June 27, the Toronto Star published a story under the heading "Morningside hires Watergate's Liddy." The story reads in part as follows:

> Convicted Watergate conspirator G. Gordon Liddy bounded out of a jail term into the waiting arms of CBC-Radio.
>
> Morningside has picked Watergate's notorious master plumber to comment regularly during the Republican and Democratic conventions in the United States this summer, and to report on the fall presidential campaign trail.

I presume this is the justification, for it goes on to say:

> Liddy organized break-ins at the office of the National Democratic Committee headquarters in the Watergate complex in Washington and at the office of Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist. Morningside hired Liddy after he appeared on the program recently promoting his book, Will. In it, he expresses no regrets about his role in the Watergate scandal and reveals that he was ready to kill syndicated columnist Jack Anderson, one-time friend Howard Hunt, and John Dean. He confirms once telling a senior White House aide, "If you want anyone killed, just let me know." And he sticks to this view of life, "The end justifies the means. Extreme measures require and justify extreme means."

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Is this story correct? Has the CBC in fact hired this disreputable fellow to report on the forthcoming political campaign in the United States? If so, what are the terms of his engagement? Finally, can the CBC justify an engagement of this kind?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Goldenberg poses an interesting and important question. Certainly inquiries will go forward to obtain the information he seeks. In the meantime, I hope that tape recordings are made of all of Mr. Liddy's broadcasts and there will be no blanking out of any of them.

HUMAN RIGHTS

STATUS OF NATIVE WOMEN

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that the case of Sandra Lovelace is about to come before the United Nations, and given that on Monday in the other place the minister said that the Indian women might have to wait an additional two years for a resolution of this matter, despite the commitment of the Clark government of last fall to delete section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, would the Leader of the Government bring to the Senate a progress report on discussions which the government is having with native people to arrive at a new policy on the question of human rights for native women?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward immediately on that question.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NEW YORK STATE—DISCRIMINATORY LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my question is to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Two or three days ago the Minister of Industry and Tourism of Ontario requested the support of the federal government in opposing the recently passed New York law which discriminates against foreign steel supplies. Is the minister able to tell the Senate if that matter is being discussed between our government and the U.S. government? Can he also tell us whether, during the Prime Minister's recent visit with the President of the United States in Venice, discussions of this matter took place?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will make some inquiries in an effort to determine the stage of the discussions at this time. However, I can tell my honourable friend that the Canadian government is disturbed at this kind of action and some discussions are in progress. I will report on this later.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator van

Roggen's question yesterday concerning the re-injection of gas at Prudhoe Bay. I am advised that Arco has no immediate concern with the re-injection process, according to one of their spokesmen. It is their feeling that using some of the gas as the fuel to re-inject could continue until at least 1986 if no new reserves are found. They are continually studying the field at Prudhoe Bay.

If it eventually becomes uneconomic to use gas as the fuel of injection, the company will turn to other methods such as the waterflood method. The situation is being carefully studied and monitored constantly by the producers at Prudhoe Bay.

As a point of information, using gas to re-inject causes a loss of pressure annually, which requires an increase in compression resulting in a five per cent loss of energy.

THE ENVIRONMENT

CONVERSION OF U.S. ELECTRICITY GENERATING STATIONS—POTENTIAL INCREASE IN AIR POLLUTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have two brief statements on matters of interest to honourable senators. The first relates to acid rain. Honourable senators may be aware that the U.S. Senate has approved a bill providing for reduction of U.S. reliance on foreign oil through conversion of some oil-fired plants to coal.

This bill will be subject to further consideration by the House of Representatives. Thus far the House has not shown enthusiasm for the proposal, and a number of House Committees have indicated they will hold careful hearings before they agree to vote on it.

Canadian concerns about the increase in acid rain causing pollutants associated with this proposal have been made known to senior members of the U.S. Administration a number of times in recent months. A detailed expression of these concerns was also provided to the Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and relayed to many other members of Congress.

The government will continue to make its concerns on this proposal known to the U.S. government.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISHERIES—EAST COAST BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The next matter I wish to deal with relates to fisheries. Honourable senators, formally and informally, have asked questions relating to the possibility of a settlement of the east coast fisheries dispute.

As far as Canada is concerned, the East Coast Fisheries Agreement, signed in March 1979, provided for a fair and comprehensive settlement of the issues under dispute. We do not know how long it will take for the U.S. to ratify the treaties.

In the meantime we have to protect Canadian interests as best we can. This is why the government announced, on June 12, an increase of Canadian fishing for groundfish on Georges Bank. We are presently considering what other measures might be necessary to protect our interests.

FISHERIES

1980 SEAL HUNT—DYE-MARKING OF SEAL PUPS

Question No. 11 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. During the 1980 seal hunt were any seals dye-sprayed by members of the Greenpeace organization or by others and, if so, were those persons apprehended?

2. When will the final results of the effects of dye-spraying of seals during the 1980 seal hunt be known?

3. Give details of the effect on seals if sprayed with large quantities of dye, if results of examination are available.

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

1. On March 13, 1980, Greenpeace claimed that six of its members had marked 150 seals with green dye during the previous day.

It appears that a total of two seal pups were surreptitiously marked either with a crayon or "magic marker" by five individuals while pretending to pet or stroke the animals. This took place on an offshore patch of ice holding a total of 38 to 40 seal pups, which had been designated by the Fisheries Officer in charge of Conservation and Protection at the Magdalen Islands, for viewing by a bona fide nature tour group organized by Hanns Ebensten Travel Inc., of New York. The individuals concerned had obtained reservations to Ebensten's "Ice-pack Tours", and went to the ice for 45 minutes on the first trip, on the morning of March 11; they broke away from the group leaders long enough to mark the two seals, and take a few photos. They immediately returned ashore, and left the Ebensten group without notice, taking off for the mainland on a Quebec Air flight departing at 13:55. They apparently made no mention to anyone of their actions until they were out of the country, at which point the claim seems to have been made in a news release put out by the Greenpeace Foundation, that 150 animals were marked. The five individuals included three Americans, and one each from England and France. They were not apprehended since their act was not known until the press release was issued only after they had left Canada.

2. The effects of marking these two seals (there was no dye-spraying as such) are nil.

The offshore, large vessel hunt at the Magdalen Islands had already been terminated by the date on which the seals were marked, so there could obviously be no direct effect on the sealers' catch, even if large numbers of animals had been marked. Moreover, seal pups at that time had reached the "tanner" stage, i.e. they had started shredding their white fur, and were already largely independent of their mothers. Consequently, the value of the pelts could not have been affected, nor would the mother-pup bond have been likely to be disturbed.

3. Effects of dye-marking seal pups would likely depend upon the age of the pup, the type and amount of dye used, ambient environmental conditions and possibly the age of the pup's mother.

Studies have shown that limited amounts of some dyes have little direct effect on the pup or on subsequent mother-pup interactions.

Copious amounts of dye, however, could change the reflectance and transmittance characteristics of the white lanugo, and affect the pup's thermoregulation. Furthermore, if the dye included a wetting agent, it would further reduce the insulative properties of the pelt, an effect which could be especially serious to a very young animal which had not yet built up a heavy blubber layer.

In addition it is possible that certain dyes may possess odours which could interfere with the mother's ability to identify her own pup. Any such interference with the mother-pup interactions would have serious consequences on nursing and the chance of survival of the pups since they grow at a rate of about 2.5 kg/day during nursing, and the nursing period on average lasts only about 9 days.

The type and quantity of dye, or the extent of spraying which would be required to mark a seal permanently to the point of destroying the market value of its pelt could therefore seriously compromise the chances of survival of the marked seals.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL FRUIT AND VEGETABLE STORAGE CONSTRUCTION FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 13 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Have any applications been received under the Federal Fruit and Vegetable Storage Construction Financial Assistance Program from the Province of Newfoundland? If so, (a) how many have been approved, and (b) in what amounts?

2. Were any applications received and turned down? If so, for what reasons?

Reply by the Minister of Agriculture:

1. Yes.

(a) None.

(b) N/A

2. Yes. Two applications were turned down because neither producer group could meet the financial requirements of the program to directly finance the minimum of one-third of the project cost.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Question No. 17 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

[Senator Marshall.]

Regarding Release E-26, Agriculture Canada, what is the breakdown, by province, of the $41.2 million in loans made under the Farm Improvement Loans Act in the first quarter of 1980?

Reply by the Minister of Agriculture:

Province	No. of loans	Amount
British Columbia	262	$ 3,744,514
Alberta	1,367	14,143,602
Saskatchewan	1,338	14,645,770
Manitoba	492	5,162,708
Ontario	185	2,174,076
Quebec	14	480,775
New Brunswick	19	123,102

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

CORRECTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege to call attention to a very minor correction that is required in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of yesterday. Under "Inquiries," Notice No. 2 for Tuesday, July 15, it states:

That we will call the attention of the Senate—

I should just like to say that I do not aspire to the editorial "we" and certainly not to the royal "we". It should read:

That he will call the attention of the Senate—

• (1425)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to report on two matters. The first is on our schedule for next week.

Honourable senators will remember that yesterday I said we might sit extra hours next week in the hope that Parliament could finish its business by July 17 or 18. I said I did not think that this was likely, but that I would let you know today.

The news is that a very serious effort is being made to reach that objective, and therefore I am respectfully asking honourable senators to sit next week on Monday and Tuesday evenings, Wednesday afternoon and perhaps Wednesday evening. I don't think it will be necessary to sit Wednesday

Senator Nurgitz: One final supplementary. I take it, then, there is a policy of not disclosing who the twin member is.

Senator Flynn: Do you know your own twin?

Senator Perrault: There seems to be almost a passionate zeal on the part of the official opposition to try to create the impression in the country that there is an attempt on the government side to suppress information. This has been one of the most forthcoming governments in the history of this country.

Senator Flynn: That is the best joke I have heard for some time.

Senator Nurgitz: Given the openness of the government leader, I trust he will not object to giving us in the next day or two the list of twin members.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator is seeking the assistance of one of these so-called twinned MPs in respect of a particular problem, why not send the problem over to us and we will do our best to solve it for him.

Senator Asselin: Produce the list.

THE ECONOMY

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Roblin's question of June 25 last regarding the broadening of the policy relating to small business development bonds so that these instruments could be used by small businessmen to raise working capital.

I wish to inform the honourable senator that I have consulted with the Minister of Finance on this matter. He indicated that the decision to introduce the measure on April 21, 1980, was based on the need to help small business continue to expand despite present interest rates. The proposal achieves this objective in two basic ways: first, it allows interest subsidies to small businesses for the purpose of acquiring new capital assets which are vital to expansion and to finance research and development expenditures.

Secondly, it allows interest subsidies to small corporations in financial difficulty and in this latter case the funds can be used for any business purpose including working capital needs.

It is important to note that this proposal endeavours to foster the development of small businesses. The government feels that the proposal, as outlined in the communiqué dated June 13, 1980, is the most efficient means of allocating scarce resources to attain this objective.

Accordingly, the Minister of Finance is of the view that it would not be appropriate to broaden the terms of small business development bonds so as to include all refinancing of working capital requirements.

I would be very happy to send the honourable senator a copy of that communiqué if he does not already have it.

ENERGY

PROMOTION OF PETROLEUM SUBSTITUTES—TAXATION POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to Senator Roblin's question of June 25 concerning the application of the seven cents per gallon (1.5 cents per litre) special excise tax on petroleum substitutes, in particular, gasohol, which is a blend of 90 per cent gasoline and 10 per cent alcohol. The government has received several inquiries about the application of the seven cents per gallon excise tax to gasohol.

Different provinces have adopted different positions. Manitoba, as the honourable senator knows, provides full exemption from its gasoline tax levies for gasohol. Ontario, on the other hand, exempts only that portion of the blended product which represents the alcohol content.

Complete exemption from the seven cents per gallon levy for gasohol could have adverse revenue consequences as well as encouraging wasteful use of this precious resource.

Various options which may achieve energy conservation by encouraging the use of gasoline substitutes are currently under review. No firm decision has been made to date as to whether any or all of them will be implemented.

Q & M PIPELINE—ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to a question directed to me by Senator Marshall on June 25 regarding the status of environmental studies related to the application by Q & M pipelines to construct a pipeline from near Quebec City to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated on several occasions that the government remains committed to reducing the dependence of the Atlantic provinces on imported oil and that the natural gas pipeline extension is a preferred way of achieving this objective. He stated last week in the other place that he has had two meetings with the promoters of the Q & M project and has asked them to continue their study on the environmental aspects identified by the National Energy Board. To date there has been no decision by the company to complete these studies or to file a new application with the NEB. The minister also indicated he hoped to discuss the project again in the near future with his provincial colleagues in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I might add that with regard to the Quebec extension, the Quebec government is expected to make a final decision on the pipeline's right of way under its land use legislation this summer so that construction can commence early next year. This would provide for completion of the Q & M pipeline as far east as Quebec City.

I would like to add also that while I now have the information respecting the question asked by Senator Marshall regarding shipbuilding, perhaps in view of the hour it would be satisfactory if I were to give that reply tomorrow.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on the status of the Garrison Dam controversy which may be of interest. The government is deeply disappointed at the July 2 decision taken at the House-Senate Conference to approve the additional Garrison appropriation of $9.7 million, particularly in light of the government's strong efforts through the embassy in Washington and the actions of the Manitoba government and the initiatives of concerned Canadian parliamentarians to make United States Congressmen well aware of Canada's concern over the provision of any new funding for the project.

The government has noted the stipulation of Congress that the additional appropriation will not be for work directly affecting Canada. Through our embassy, however, the government has this week secured confirmation from senior U.S. Administration officials that any construction activity funded by the new appropriation will not provide for any drainage into Canadian waters, that is inter-basin transfers.

While the government finds the recent action by Congress disturbing, it should be noted that the entire project remains under internal review by the U.S. Administration. Accordingly, the government will continue to take every available opportunity to reiterate Canada's concerns over the project as currently designed, and to urge that the project be modified to eliminate all inter-basin transfers of water and associated harmful foreign "biota." The United States government has given us formal assurances that it will honour its Boundary Waters Treaty obligations and commitments to Canada. We will continue to do everything possible to ensure that this will be the case.

Honourable senators, may I state in addition that I have been informed by the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister that Canada's concerns regarding Garrison were made known to President Carter at the Venice Summit Meeting, indicating the importance that the government places on this entire matter.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—MAIL DELIVERY GUARANTEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by the Honourable Senator Molson on June 5 regarding his concern for mail delivery guarantees. The answer is quite long, and in the interest of saving time it might be the wish of honourable senators to have this answer printed as part of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Or perhaps Honourable Senator Molson would like to receive the answer verbally tomorrow.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Molson: I would be quite satisfied, if it is an important statement, to have it placed on the record. If it is not, then I would be quite happy to have a copy of the reply.

Senator Flynn: Put it on the record.

Senator Perrault: Very well.

(The answer follows:)

Canada Post attaches the highest importance to achieving a high rate of reliability in mail delivery, and that it has achieved considerable success in meeting the most demanding specifications it has set for itself in this area.

The current first-class mail service specifications, developed to replace the "Assured Mail Program", were adopted in May, 1978, between 22 major offices and were subsequently extended to other post offices. According to these specifications, postal managers have introduced operating plans to ensure the following:

—next-day delivery for mail destined to the socio-economic area as determined by historical practices, customer expectations and needs;

—next-day delivery for closely paired cities where there has existed a precedent for this level of service and where operational capability permits this;

—second-day delivery to other selected paired cities where it is operationally possible; and

—third-day delivery to other post offices except isolated and remote areas.

The above basic service commitments apply to letter-size items and flats which comply with "Canadian Postal Standards".

Canada Post plans to better its performance and reliability by improving the integration of key centres and by keeping critical connections to a minimum. They are now analyzing operations at these key centres to ensure that the collection and delivery, processing and distribution systems within them perform effectively, both individually and when fully integrated.

To promote an understanding and commitment to service specifications, internal "rule books" are being prepared which outline the basic operational principles to be used at each individual plant in developing operational plans that will result in meeting schedules and time specifications. Moreover, to identify areas not meeting specifications we are establishing system and service performance indicators at the working level for the timely application of corrective measures.

Their specifications as to reliability have been set at a high level and much work remains to achieve these specifications across the whole country. In the upcoming planning period they will continue to concentrate our efforts towards meeting these higher standards.

In the recent past they have made substantial progress in improving their reliability. Canada Post remains confident that the above programs will contribute in no small measure to providing Canadians with a reliability in the mails that is second to none.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISHERIES—EAST COAST BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there was a question asked by Senator Marshall on June 12 regarding the East Coast Boundary controversy over fisheries. The question has been answered by a news release, on June 6 by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Again that could be printed as part of the record if honourable senators agree.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The news release follows:)

A ban on commercial fishing of Atlantic salmon, imposed in April 1972 as a conservation measure in certain areas of Atlantic Canada, will continue in 1980, Fisheries and Oceans Minister Roméo LeBlanc announced today.

"The ban," said Mr. LeBlanc, "was introduced as a conservation measure to allow salmon stocks to increase. However, the advice of our fisheries experts indicates that the recovery of the stocks has not yet reached a level to justify a resumption of commercial fishing."

The minister added that the department last year undertook a thorough review of the Atlantic salmon fishery, including biological considerations and the economic and social impact within the Atlantic provinces. A comprehensive plan is now being developed, covering management and the further enhancement potential for Atlantic salmon stocks.

Mr. LeBlanc said that subject to Federal Treasury Board approval, compensation payments will continue to be paid in 1980 to fishermen prevented from fishing as a result of the commercial salmon ban. This compensation amounts to approximately $1.5 million annually, and will continue at 1979 payment levels for some 700 commercial fishermen.

Because of the commitment made by the previous government to continue the ban on commercial salmon fishing, and due also to the fact that the new administration has not had sufficient time to fully assess the situation, a decision to reopen the fishery, even on a limited basis, could not have been made in time for the fishermen to gear up for the 1980 fishing season, said the minister.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO AND MIRABEL AIRPORTS—INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked on June 12 by the Honourable Senator Smith regarding user and landing fees at Ministry of Transport owned and operated airports.

The answer is as follows. The general policy is to recover the costs of facilities and services provided, at public expense, in support of air transportation. The specific cost recovery objective for facilities and services must, however, be assessed on its own merit. In the case of the proposed increases in landing fees and general terminal fees, there is a need to generate additional revenue to fund the Air Transportation Program. For example, a deficit of $356 million is forecast for the program in fiscal year 1980-81.

Honourable senators, I have other questions to which I shall give the replies tomorrow.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, would the honourable leader permit me to ask a further question about the Garrison project? Is he able to provide the house with a copy of the communication from the Government of the United States in respect to this matter. It would certainly help to clarify at least one person's understanding of the matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That inquiry will go forward, and if it is possible to provide that document it certainly will be tabled.

GRAIN

COUNTRY ELEVATOR SYSTEM—GRADE PROMOTION

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, a question was asked of me by the Honourable Senator Bielish on May 29. The question was as follows:

Could the minister inform the house and the farmers of western Canada whether he has investigated grade promotion or upgrading practised by the country elevator system and, if so, have the results of his investigation led to the assurance that the producer is receiving full value for his grains?

Honourable senators, the answer is somewhat lengthy and, if it is agreed, I will have it printed in the record as though it had been read at this point.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The fundamental principle of grain grading is to assure each producer on delivery to the country elevator receives the grade his grain is entitled to under the grade established by the Canadian Grain Commission. Where a dispute arises upon delivery, an agreed on sample by the farmer and the country elevator agent is submitted to the Canadian Grain Commission's chief inspector and the grade he establishes is binding on the purchase of the grain. Once the grain is in the elevator and ownership has changed, the elevator agent can then blend the grain in any manner he wishes to improve its quality. For example, he could buy grain from five farmers totalling 5,000 bushels, which was at the top of the No. 1 grade. He could buy grain from five farmers totalling 5,000 bushels, which was above average of the No. 2 grade, blend the two 5,000 lots together and ship 10,000 bushels that would grade No. 1. I use this as an extreme example for illustration purposes only. In practice, blending within the country system in total represents less than 10 per cent in grade gains. The overall benefit, while not directly, is certainly indirectly a benefit to the farmers. The elevator company has an earning that may allow it to operate at a lower country tariff than would otherwise be required. A producer co-operative elevator company has these additional funds that will in due course be distributed to its membership.

TRANSPORTATION

MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY, NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL GRANT FOR RESEARCH

Question No. 3—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Has Memorial University, in the Province of Newfoundland, ever applied for a federal grant for transportation research to focus university attention on Canadian transportation problems and to increase the number of students specializing in transportation studies for the industry and government?

2. If an application was received, was it approved? If not, why not?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

1. According to our records Memorial University of Newfoundland has not applied for a grant under the program supporting transportation research at various Canadian Universities.

At the present time there is provision for only one grant-supported centre for transportation studies in the Atlantic Provinces, the Canadian Marine Transportation Centre at Dalhousie University in Halifax. Under the "Centres of Excellence" policy the very limited federal funds available for transportation research activities at universities are directed to those universities which have well-developed and recognized transportation programs at the graduate level. Memorial is not one of these.

However, in 1974 Memorial University did receive a $4,500 grant from the Transportation Development Agency to help support a transportation conference in Gander.

2. Not applicable.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John. J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act.

[Senator Argue.]

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, happens to be a very short piece of legislation. It contains but two clauses, and its purpose is to extend a program that would have ended on March 31, 1981 to March 31, 1982. It extends also the time within which employers may register for participation in the program. The extension of that right is for one year. This is all contained in clause 1 of the bill.

• (2120)

Clause 2 of the bill says that the effective date of the amendment will be April 15, 1980, which is the day after that on which this session commenced.

Having said that, I think I can add that I have said more about this bill in these last few minutes than was said in the House of Commons in eight or nine days of debate. But the bill, for the Senate, is certainly a matter of déjà vu. In January 1978 the Senate had before it Bill C-23, which was an act to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the Employment Tax Credit Program. That bill was debated in this chamber on January 31 and February 1, 1978. For the record, that debate can be found in the Hansard of this house for the session of 1977-78 at pages 280 and 286. The bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which considered it on the 1st and 2nd days of February, 1978. For the record, committee's proceedings on the bill can be found in issue No. 15 for that session. The minister appeared before the committee, and so did officials of the department. The committee then reported to the Senate on the bill.

I should say something about the program envisaged here, if only to recall to honourable senators what we all knew two years ago but which, no doubt, like myself, everyone has forgotten in the meantime. In the first place, the Employment Tax Credit Program does not involve direct grants or subsidies or subventions in the public sector of the economy by governments. Programs of that kind have already been announced by the appropriate minister, and I think if I referred to them in a general way that would be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of all senators.

There are community service projects, community development projects, new technology employment programs, and employment programs for the disadvantaged. We also have a multiplicity of training programs which are the result of a direct subvention by the federal exchequer. Some of these programs are the Native Opportunity Training Program, the Critical Trade Skills Training Program, the Non-Traditional Training for Women, the Refugee Language Training Program, and so on. We have the Summer Youth Employment Program, the Canada Works Carryover Program, the Local Employment Assistance Program.

I am told that the sum total of all of these programs involves jobs or training places in the fiscal year for over 122,000 people, and that the cost is roughly $370 million.

This program, as honourable senators may remember, is an attempt to foster employment in the private sector of the economy by reducing the cost of wages paid for new jobs created by employers. The method used to assist the employer in the private sector to do that is to provide him with a tax credit. At this point perhaps I should say what the amount of the tax credit is in the various regions of the country. The regions are those prescribed in the Regional Development Incentives Act, which is a statute of this Parliament.

In the Atlantic region and the Gaspé the amount of the tax credit is $2 per hour per new job. In the more populous regions of southern Canada, both east and west, such as Montreal, western Quebec including Hull, southern Ontario and southern British Columbia, the amount of the tax credit is $1.50 per hour per new job. In the other regions of the country the tax credit is $1.75 per hour.

Those figures seem rather meaningless without being put into some context, and the best method to follow might be to use an example to explain how these proposed credits are to be applied. For the sake of an example, let us consider only the situation in the Atlantic region. Assume an employer creates a new job for which he will pay the new employee $5 an hour, and assume also that the employee in this new job will work a 40-hour week for 50 weeks. In one year he will have worked 2,000 hours, and the total cost of that job to the employer, therefore, will have been $5 times 2,000, or $10,000. Because we are talking about the Atlantic region, the tax credit will be determined at $2 per hour for 2,000 hours, and will be $4,000. That tax credit, under a provision in the mother act which amended the Income Tax Act, is taxable. So the $4,000 tax credit that became available to the employer is added to the employer's income.

Let us say that in this case the employer is the owner of a small business rather than of a large corporation. As honourable senators know, the income tax rate for small businesses is 25 per cent. Since $4,000 is to be added to the earned income of the small business it will be taxed at the rate of 25 per cent, and, therefore, the tax on that amount will be $1,000. The benefit therefore from the $4,000 taxable tax credit is $3,000, and that $3,000 accrues to the benefit of the employer.

● (2130)

The gross cost to the employer of this new job which he created is $10,000; the tax benefit that he gets under this legislation is $3,000, so the actual cost of that job for that first year—the only year in which he is entitled to this benefit—is $7,000. It costs him $7,000 to create a new job, for which he pays the employee $10,000.

That tax credit, honourable senators, can be carried forward for five years. Excluded from the program are temporary jobs and jobs of personal service. Two years ago, when we had this legislation before us, we discussed whether or not new ventures qualified. At that time we were told—and the rule still applies—that they do not.

There is a once only credit allowed for each job. The employee, in order to qualify for a new job, must be out of work for at least two weeks and he must be under the age of 65 years.

It may be of advantage and helpful to honourable senators if at this point I were permitted to place on the record a table showing the agreements signed and the jobs created in the fiscal year 1978-79, which was really the first year of the program, and the fiscal year 1979-80.

I might say that when the program was first announced in 1978, it was hoped that 50,000 jobs a year would be created. In the first fiscal year that expectation was not realized, only 16,711 jobs being created under the program. However, the program was thought to be valid enough for an intensive advertising campaign to be undertaken by the department, as a result of which in the fiscal year from March 31, 1979 to March 31, 1980, 50,906 jobs are said to have been created. The tables to which I have just referred give not only the number of jobs created in each of those two fiscal years but also give the number created by provinces.

May I also place on the record, honourable senators, another table showing the jobs by standard industrial code? I do not know too much about the meaning of the words "standard industrial code," but the table indicates the percentage of jobs that have been created in agriculture, forestry, fish and game, mines, manufacturing, construction, transportation, trade and commerce, finance and insurance, and services.

Perhaps honourable senators might be interested to know that 51 per cent of all the jobs were in manufacturing; 19 per cent were in trade and commerce; 12.7 per cent were in services, and there were smaller percentages in the other categories of employment. I now ask permission to place those two tables on the record?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Connolly: I am told that the majority of the firms that participated in the program were small business firms. In fact, 77 per cent of the firms which participated had less than 20 employees. Over 50 per cent of the people employed were under the age of 35. The average schooling that employees taken on under the plan had acquired was to the level of grade 11. The wages of the employees varied quite a bit by region, but the average was somewhere between $180 and $200 per week. I am told that 34 per cent of the persons employed were women, which is not a bad record when one considers the fact that women account for some 40 per cent of the work force.

I am informed that of the employers who participated, 92 per cent have said that they would participate again. It was hoped originally that the jobs would be continuing, permanent jobs. I am informed that 48 per cent have continued for more than the year in which the program was operative.

Honourable senators, this is not by any means a complete answer to the unemployment problem in this country, but I believe that from a poor start the program has picked up and it seems to me to be a valid type of program to have in place at a time like this.

We are not the only country that has programs founded upon similar concepts. There are similar programs in the United States, Spain, Sweden and France. I think the second year of experience with this program has proved to be more helpful and to have had a more positive effect than in other countries.

To summarize, I would use the example which I used originally. The 50,000 jobs created by this program in the second fiscal year, at $10,000 per job, mean that a half-billion dollars was put into the economy. The cost to the government, estimated to be the same as it was when the program was begun, was $100 million or 20 per cent; the 80 per cent or $400 million that went into the economy as a result of the program was contributed by the employers, who, of course, got the benefit of the work done by the new employees. The cost to a small businessman of a job that paid $10,000 a year, in the example I used, would be about $7,000. By comparison, the cost for a big businessman or a corporation would be about $8,000.

Honourable senators, as I have said, I do not think this program is a complete answer to the unemployment problem in this country, but it is an attempt, by co-operation between the public authority and the private sector, to do something positive about creating new jobs and, hopefully, permanent ones.

If the bill receives second reading and if honourable senators desire that it be sent to a committee, I would suggest that the appropriate committee is the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and I would make a motion to that effect.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault moved the second reading of Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

He said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, this amendment in Bill C-35 is simply for the purpose of extending the existing legislation for three years to December 31, 1984. I am sure that every member of this chamber, like the members of the other place, have had and still have a very deep interest in this legislation which was passed about 10 years ago.

If I remember correctly, His Honour the Speaker was the first Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thériault: I believe it was said by everyone who spoke on this amendment in the other place that great things have come out of this legislation—perhaps not everything we expected, but nevertheless progress has been made. Many people in government, including the new minister, his immediate predecessor, and others before him, feel that the time has arrived to take another in-depth look at the operations of that whole department.

I believe that proper legislation, or at least a paper on the program, would have been introduced by now had it not been—and my comments are not intended to be political—for the intervening elections with different ministers taking different views at different times.

I am informed that the present minister hoped to be able to present legislation encompassing the whole operation of the department before the expiry of this act, but found that more information and more studies were required and he, therefore, saw the necessity of introducing an amendment to extend the life of the statute by five years.

There are many reasons for this step. As many of you are aware, before a plant is built, machinery has to be ordered, and before the operation goes ahead a long time may elapse. I am informed that at the present time, under the existing legislation, at least 30 applications for incentives cannot be proceeded with because of the expiry date of December 31, 1981. I will not bore this chamber with more details of the reasons for the amendment. I think they are self-explanatory.

The benefits that have accrued, especially in the area of the country in which I live, the Atlantic provinces, and in some other parts of the country, are tremendous. I personally believe that this program and this department has to be strengthened. As the minister has requested, I believe it has to be funded in a more permanent manner since I am often told that when a prospective industry is approached, it is concerned about the permanency of the program and, therefore, does not really bother to take an in-depth look at establishing in an area where it may benefit by incentives under this program. Of course, that applies especially to major industries.

I hope this house will be afforded an opportunity to discuss the new legislation even before it is passed in the other place. Hopefully, that will come forward this fall or early next year. Regardless of what part of the country the members of this house are from, they will realize that progress has been made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in slow growth areas as a result of this legislation.

Nevertheless, I repeat that, in my humble opinion, the department has to be strengthened. The minister responsible for that program must be given an opportunity to have some say in the co-ordination of activities and programs of other departments. Over the years it has been found that different bureaucracies do not always see eye to eye on how to solve various problems, and sometimes empire building becomes more important than the net benefit to the people who are affected.

The amendment is, as I say, to extend the legislation until December 31, 1984. Therefore, honourable senators, I would hope that with these few words of explanation you will pass this measure, with hope that we will have an opportunity to put forward our views on the whole operation as soon as possible.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Copies of document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms or errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970", issued by the Department of Justice.

Report on the Audit of the Office of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, pursuant to section 7 of the Auditor General Act, Chapter 34, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, July 15, I will call the attention of the Senate to:

Some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights, (the British Columbia Reference Case) (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792 and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, by reason of which the said judgment does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

In view of the fact that I have had a similar Notice of Inquiry standing on the order paper for some time, perhaps I might be permitted a word of explanation. My purpose in proceeding with this second inquiry is simply to divide the subject into discussions of convenient length. If I were to deal with the whole problem in one speech, I am afraid I would inflict myself upon honourable senators, with their consent, until they might not be willing to continue that consent. So it seemed to me that to divide the subject matter which I wish to discuss into two would help honourable senators to endure what I have to say.

Senator Frith: Perhaps you might explain the two divisions.

Senator Smith: The first inquiry would deal with the judgment of the court itself—that is, what it says—and emphasize the fact that the judgment recognizes that there might be historical facts which are different in other places from those which the court had to consider in reference to British Columbia. That would be the subject of my first inquiry.

The second inquiry would be to go on to discuss what those facts are.

Senator Frith: Would it be the wish of the proposer that once his remarks with reference to the first inquiry were completed and someone on this side were to adjourn the debate, that that would be the time to do so; that is, to complete the first division of the inquiry and then to proceed to the second?

Senator Smith: That is what I rather hope will happen.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

REFERRAL TO LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms or errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970," tabled in the Senate this day, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

• (1405)

By way of explanation, honourable senators, this, I believe, is the third such periodic document proposing non-controversial amendments to statutes. Often they involve simple typographical errors, and the practice that has developed in both houses is to refer the document to the appropriate committee in each house. I understand that this document is being tabled in the House of Commons today and will be referred to their judicial committee. This is what happened in the case of the previous two, and for that reason I am moving that this document be referred to the appropriate committee in this chamber.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last evening the minister in reply to Senator Charbonneau reaffirmed the government policy that no prebuild of the Foothills pipeline would be permitted until ironclad guarantees had been received from the Americans that the entire line would be completed. The minister also cited progress over recent weeks insofar as achieving those necessary guarantees is concerned.

Would the minister indicate to us if the progress to which he alluded constitutes those absolute guarantees that Canada has been seeking?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, I have been around the political scene long enough to know that there is nothing quite as absolute as seems to be involved in that question. I suppose something could happen that would either delay or have some other effect on the assurances that have been given by the United States administration, the United States Houses of Congress and the producers and sponsors involved in the building and operating of this pipeline.

But I said last night, and I can reaffirm today, that there has been a great deal of progress made in getting all of the parties involved to a higher level of commitment. If you want my personal opinion, I believe an assessment of those commitments leads to the conclusion that all of those people in the United States are very anxious that the pipeline should be built in its entirety and, indeed, as soon as possible.

Senator Balfour: I have supplementary question for the minister. Accepting the remarks he has just made at their face value, I would, nevertheless, point out that approval of the prebuild, if it were to be given in the absence of absolute assurances that the remainder of the line would be built, would in effect constitute a decision to export Canadian natural gas. My question is this: Is it still the policy of the government, as enunciated by Mr. Lalonde last December 6, that our bias as Canadians should be against any gas exports outside of Canada, and that approval of further exports would go down in history as one of the greatest sell-outs we have seen?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should keep up with historical facts that have taken place. Obviously he has either not done his homework or he is ignoring some important facts.

Senator Perrault: The Tory Research Bureau.

Senator Olson: Yes, the Tory Research Bureau or whatever. The fact is that there have been some decisions made by the National Energy Board since December 6, 1979, after adequate hearings, that there is something over four trillion cubic feet of gas in excess of providing for all the requirements of Canadian use that are contained within the formula to arrive at that figure. It seems to me that the honourable senator should take those factors into account. That is not a decision made by the government. It is a decision made by a board that is set up with terms of reference, a board in which I would expect both sides of this house to have some confidence.

• (1410)

Senator Balfour: Is the minister in effect telling us that additional discoveries of natural gas have been made since December 6 last, which now justify the approval of massive exports of Canadian natural gas to the United States? Is that what he is saying?

Senator Olson: No, that is not what I said at all.

Senator Flynn: He tries never to say anything.

Senator Olson: What I said was that there were hearings under way probably before December 6. The consideration of the National Energy Board, who are charged with the responsibility of making an assessment of those hearings and all the data that support those hearings, is such that they have reached the conclusion, and indeed recommmended, that an export permit be granted for, I think it is, 4.2 trillion cubic feet of gas through more than one delivery point, some of which would go through the prebuild system.

Senator Balfour: Is the minister in effect saying that Mr. Lalonde, when he made his statement on December 6, had failed to do his homework?

Senator Olson: No, not at all.

Senator Flynn: Oh yes.

Senator Olson: In case the honourable senator is unaware of the fact, let me point out that that is over six months ago.

Senator Flynn: He wanted to win the election.

Senator Olson: There have been some important decisions made by the people charged with the responsibility of assessing the data and the submissions that are made to the National Energy Board, and that decision was not made until, I think, April, which is some time later than December 6.

Senator Flynn: Hot air. He only wanted to win the election.

Senator Perrault: You are living in the past over there.

Senator Flynn: You are living in the past and you are looking to the future.

Hon. G. I. Smith: It might do the honourable senator some good to consider the past too. I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Even he must find it very difficult to be certain in his own mind that Mr. Lalonde was well informed when he made those remarks last December.

Senator Olson: If I left the implication or imputation that Mr. Lalonde was not well informed then, I certainly want to take it back, because I think he was very well informed then.

Senator Flynn: You still don't know.

Senator Olson: I think the problem we have is that the honourable gentlemen of the opposition have not been informed of what has happened in the last three or four months.

Senator Perrault: They never have been.

Senator Flynn: You still don't know what the situation was.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I could, if I wished, I think, draw a parallel between the inability of the minister to explain Mr. Lalonde's statements with my inability to reconcile his statements with those of Mr. Axworthy in connection with the drought situation.

I am going to pursue this gas pipeline business if I may, and I have two questions to start out with. The honourable minister went to Washington recently, and after he came back, or at the same time, the American Congress passed what I call a comforting resolution in respect of the major pipeline development that is in prospect in Alberta. Was any indication given to my honourable friend that the conditions laid down by the American Congress in 1977 with respect to pipeline principles were discussed, and if so were any conclusions arrived at? I refer particularly to the resolution of the American Congress that the United States government would not participate in any way in the financing of such a pipeline. I want to know whether there has been any change in their position on that.

The second principle that was adopted by them at the same time had to do with the tracking of prices. My honourable friend may understand me if I try to explain it by saying that they declined to approve the charging of prices of gas coming from Canada in advance of the completion of the whole pipeline system.

● (1415)

Senator Olson: You mean from Alaska?

Senator Roblin: That's right. I am talking about the Alaska pipeline. We will come back to the prebuild in a minute or two; but I want to clear the ground, if I may, in the first instance, by inquiring whether any change was made in the principles adopted by the American Congress in 1977 on these two points.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should realize that the United States government or the Congress has not been asked to finance the pipeline. The pipeline was to be built with private financing. I do not think the United States government or Congress make it a practice of announcing that they stand behind the United States Treasury when they have not been asked to do so. So far as I am concerned, it is a rhetorical question.

In response to the honourable senator's comment that the motion was one of comfort, I would recommend that he read the motion that was passed in both Houses of Congress. It seems to me that the words are clear and positive. It does not change the law but it sets down in unequivocal terms the position of those two houses. In my view, that is far more than "comfort".

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Roblin: I am glad that my honourable friend is soothed by what he learned in Washington, but I have to tell him that my questions are not rhetorical. I am referring him to the resolution of the United States Congress which prohibits the financing of the pipeline by the United States government. The minister knows—better than most, I suspect—that the main hangup today in proceeding with that pipeline is financing. So we can have all kinds of encouragement from the United States Congress, but if they persist in their attitude toward government financing, the situation will remain unclear. I am making no judgment as to whether that is good or bad; that is their business. I am merely trying to find out what their position is, and I take it from the minister that if it remains unchanged on those particulars, they will not participate in financing and they will not allow charging for the gas until the whole of that pipeline is completed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is still a rhetorical question, because I fail to understand how the United States Congress or the United States administration can be expected to commit the United States Treasury to financing the pipeline when they have not been asked to do so. If there are some conditions that appear to make that a desirable thing to do in the interests of the United States, I suppose they can make whatever decision they want based on those facts. However, at the moment the honourable senator should take into account the fact that the sponsors and the producers have committed themselves and signed an agreement to provide $500 million to complete the design and survey—I guess that is what one would call it—of the Alaska section of the pipeline.

Some people might say that that is a small amount, but I think that $500 million is a pretty significant amount. In fact, I consider it to be an indication that the private financiers who eventually will be asked to put the financing package together are pretty heavily committed to building the pipeline. In addition, the producers already have several billion dollars invested in Prudhoe Bay, which provides some incentive to see that the whole job is completed.

The United States administration, through their President and Secretary of Energy have on several occasions repeated to me—indeed it was reiterated by the Vice President of the United States, whom I met at the White House when I was in Washington—in the strongest possible terms their commitment to have the whole pipeline built.

In addition, and for reasons that should be obvious to my honourable friend, both Houses of Congress have passed a firm resolution that they too are committed to having the whole pipeline built.

● (1420)

It seems to me that if we are going to acquiesce to the kind of interpretation of what "absolute commitment" means, then perhaps we in Canada should wait until the U.S. has the pipeline built right to the Yukon border. That kind of action was never anticipated by the Canadian Parliament. We were going to go ahead with the construction of this together. It seems to me that the level of commitment by all parties involved is now very high.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we shall see just how far we get along with this.

Senator Perrault: Have a little faith.

Senator Roblin: I am making no effort here to decide what the policy of the United States government is; that is entirely their business. I am merely trying to ascertain the facts.

If my honourable friend had contented himself with simply saying, "Yes, the 1977 situation still persists," that would have satisfied me, since I believe that to be the truth. However, my honourable friend is going to find that some reconsideration, at least of the pricing portion of the 1977 decision in Washington, may be required to secure the financing of expenditure which now appears will be about $20 billion.

I come now to the question of the prebuild pipeline, a subject raised by one of my honourable colleagues. Has there been any change in the policy of the Canadian government toward the prebuild? I gather from the minister's rather canny answer that there probably has been, so we will wait and see what happens with respect to that.

I would ask him a question with respect to markets and prices in the United States in connection with the prebuild which, if it takes place, will allow for the export of a very large quantity of gas. We know, in connection with our present exports to the United States through British Columbia and Alberta, that users in some parts of the United States are not taking their full quotas; in fact, they are down to about 30 per cent in connection with the B.C. delivery, and that raises the question of price. Price, of course, is a significant factor in connection with financing the prebuild.

Can my honourable friend give us any statement as to what policy approaches he is taking in connection with the price negotiations for the delivery of prebuild gas, which certainly has to be a major consideration in the negotiations now taking place?

Senator Olson: The price of the prebuild gas will, I expect, be exactly the same as any other exports of gas to the United States.

My honourable friend knows that there was a change in the formula relative to the factors taken into account with respect to what the price is going to be. There was also a change announced last April as to the method and application of that price. However, that does not force United States customers to buy Canadian gas at any price and in any volume. We do not have a 100 per cent take-or-pay provision within the contracts, not only with respect to this one but with respect to previous contracts.

My honourable friend ought to know also that there is a gas bubble inside the continental United States so that there is no particular pressure during the summer of 1980 for some additional supplies. In addition, there is a lot of residual fuel around providing the BTU requirements which gas would fulfil under other conditions. That means there is a soft market at the moment in the United States. However, all of the projections I have seen indicate that that will be very short-lived and, indeed, it is the policy of the United States government to bring on the rest of the gas that may be available to them as soon as it can make the connection from the North Slope to the lower 48 states.

Senator Roblin: What does my honourable friend have to say about the attitude of the American government towards pricing? In connection with the main Alaskan pipeline, it has warned us that, in accordance with the 1977 resolution of Congress, it will not be able to project costs forward into the United States until the pipeline is completed. What relationship has the prebuild section to the 1977 resolution?

Senator Olson: I am not sure if you can relate the two. I find it difficult to try to interpret the attitude of the United States government; I would rather go on what it has very firmly said, but that would be repetitious of what I said a few minutes ago. I do not think that it would be a proper thing for any Canadian minister to try to interpret the attitude of the United States government. I can produce a copy of the resolution passed in Congress. I can produce a copy of the agreement that was signed between the producers and the sponsors of the Northern Pipeline in the United States, including the Alaska section, and I can produce a copy of the commitments made by the United States administration. If he adds that all together, I think my honourable friend can interpret the attitude of the United States as well as I can.

• (1425)

Senator Roblin: Well, I will try one last time to get my point across. The 1977 decision also prohibits the charges for any section of the pipeline from starting until all sections are completed. That raises the question of whether this particular resolution covers the prebuild, which, in my opinion, is part of the main pipeline, or whether it does not. Does my honourable friend intend to investigate that matter?

Senator Olson: I believe that my honourable friend can find the answer to that, and I will help him to do so. But my understanding of the prebuild is that a specified amount of gas will be delivered through that pipeline during the term of the contract, which I believe is something like six years, and the admissible price into the United States is known.

Senator Roblin: What is it?

Senator Olson: It is $4.47 at the moment, but the formula to determine that level changes it from time to time based on the substitution value of BTUs equivalent to imported oil into Canada. That determines the price at which it will be admissible to the United States, but it doesn't force United States customers to buy it, and, obviously, whoever is making that decision, whether it is the producers, the National Energy Board, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Canada or others, will have to take into account market conditions from time to time.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the pricing of gas that may move through the prebuild section if it goes ahead.

The honourable minister may be aware that within the last couple of weeks the Governor of Utah was in Alberta and was interviewed on a television program in which this question of United States purchase of western Canada gas through the prebuild section of this line, if it goes ahead, was raised. He expressed the view that Canadians need to realize there is a change in attitude developing in northwestern states regarding the purchase of Canadian gas because they feel the price is getting so high that it will no longer be competitive with the price of other forms of energy. He particularly mentioned that large-scale commitments were being made to generate electric energy by using coal as an alternative to Canadian gas.

I think the minister will agree that as far as the prebuild section of the line is concerned—at least, as I understand it—the only gas that will be moving through it until the total line is built on up to Alaska will be Canadian gas going to American markets. If as a result of jacking up the price of the gas at the border to the point where Americans feel it is no longer economically viable to use it, I think the minister would agree that that would raise a serious question with respect to the prebuild section, because there is no point having it except to move Canadian gas to American markets in the near future.

● (1430)

I assume that the Canadian government is monitoring the U.S. attitude towards the price it is now paying. If there is a serious problem, surely it should be thoroughly investigated before the prebuild is proceeded with, because we don't need the prebuild if the Americans are not prepared to buy the gas. The prebuild section would just sit there if it were not economically viable for the Americans to buy the gas. My own view is that it has not reached that stage.

I thought the statement by the Governor of Utah was not a criticism. He was simply pointing out that, while Americans prefer power generated by Canadian gas to power generated by local coal, the price of the Canadian gas is reaching a level where it is questionable whether it is economically viable for them to use it.

My question is: In view of the direct relationship between the selling price of gas in the United States and the cost of the prebuild section, is the Canadian government taking a serious look at the whole pricing issue?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Canadian government is looking at that. The agreement reached with Secretary Duncan in April was that there be an agreement on the formula Canada would use in adjusting its price from time to time. That agreement was based on the substitution or BTU equivalent of oil imported into Canada at Montreal.

The United States is also buying oil in that same market, the world market. Therefore it seems to me that there would be no time at which Canadian gas would be out of step with that alternative fuel.

The argument can be made, of course, that for some purposes coal could be substituted, providing the price of coal remained at a percentage below the BTU equivalent of world prices. I don't argue with that; it is a decision they would have to make.

[Senator Manning.]

It seems to me that Canada is justified in not offering its fuel to the United States at a price lower than they charge themselves. On that basis there will be times when a soft market exists, and I suppose we have such a market now. We have experienced a reasonably mild winter, and therefore a smaller amount of gas than normal was used. This is also true of residual fuel that substitutes for gas in much of the same market. This situation could change dramatically, and I suppose that American consumers would have to make a decision on that basis, and also on the basis of security of future supply.

It seems to me that for Americans to be hooked to a pipeline from Canada, and indeed to their own gas from Prudhoe Bay, is a far more secure position than relying on the changes that could take place with respect to imported oil. That ought to be taken into account.

I know of these concerns, but I do not believe it would be wise for Canada to enter into long-term agreements that would prevent us from recovering the number of dollars that it would cost for the substitution and, indeed, to be in a position where we would be required or obliged to supply gas to American customers at a price that could eventually be substantially lower than they are paying their own producers.

I know there are some distortions in that market at the moment, but I think all long-term projections indicate that there will be a viable market in the United States whenever we have any excess gas to sell them.

Senator Manning: I might make one further comment and then perhaps the minister could enlarge somewhat on this point. I think that basically we all agree that Canada should not sell an energy resource to another country at a price less than that country charges its own domestic customers, or at a price lower than that country would have to pay for the resource elsewhere.

Does the minister agree that with respect to the sale of surplus Canadian gas to the United States there are two advantages to this country in addition to getting a fair and just price for our gas? The first advantage would be the alleviation of our serious balance of payments problem. The sale of surplus Canadian gas affords us one opportunity to partially alleviate that serious balance of payments problem. It seems to me that the Government of Canada should attach some monetary value to that when considering the price of gas to the United States—in other words, it is a benefit not directly related to the price we get for our gas.

The second advantage would be in the reduction of the large volume of capped gas which exists in western Canada awaiting a market. That has now reached the point where it is having a serious detrimental impact on further exploration and development.

I suggest that these two things—the balance of payments problem and the maintenance of stimulation of exploration and development—are directly tied to the export market. I would hate to see Canada quibble over a few cents per one thousand cubic feet for the gas, thereby losing benefits to Canada that would result from the export of that surplus gas. I am interested in knowing whether the government is considering those aspects as well.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, information supplied to us indicates that the value of the gas exported through the prebuild is approximately $17 billion, based on an 8 percent escalating factor. Indeed, that escalating factor is probably going to exceed that. We are very conscious of what something over $2 billion a year would do to our balance of payments problem.

We are also conscious of the fact that there is a great deal of additional gas that has been added to the reserves since the National Energy Board considered the amount it is now ready to approve for export. There has been no further application, however, for a permit to export more gas, although we know there is a great deal more there. There are over 8,000 capped wells in Alberta that are not producing now because of a lack of markets.

We are taking all that into account, but there is another major thrust of the government that has to be taken into account. We are determined that Canadians from coast to coast will have access to this high quality clean fuel. So the amount we require to go into the rest of the line—that is, the Q & M line to Halifax and beyond, if necessary, and indeed further penetration into the existing market now served by a pipeline—has a high priority. Therefore, it seems to me that the National Energy Board and others should take a look at the totality of those requirements and then determine whether we have enough reserves to take care of all needs in the reasonable future. If there is more gas available in excess of all that, then I suppose a further application to the National Energy Board would be warranted.

● (1440)

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I hesitate to prolong the discussion on this particular subject, but it is a matter of such vital importance to not only the west, but to all of Canada, that I shall take another minute or two on it. I am disturbed by what seems to me—and I hope I am wrong—to be a rather negative attitude towards the prebuild on the part of members of the opposition—and I do not include Senator Manning in that.

Many of us in years past, as Senator Olson is aware, fought rather strenuously in various forums, with whatever means we had at our disposal, to assist the United States in making the decision to bring this gas from Alaska across Canada as opposed to having it transported in liquefied form via tanker down the west coast, which was the El Paso proposal—a proposal which was a very serious threat for a long time.

I am concerned—and I should like the minister to let me have whatever indication he may have from his officials in this respect—as to the length of time, within reasonable economic limits, the gas in Alaska can be re-injected into the ground, as it has to be at the moment in order to enable them to produce the oil which they need up there, and which they are bringing out through the Alyeska line.

I am concerned that if we do not move with the assurances we now have on the prebuild, as a first step to constructing this pipeline to Alaska, the United States is going to decide one day that they do not have a forthcoming partner in this great project in Canada and start looking at the El Paso proposal once again. To prevent any such thing happening, I think we need to give careful consideration to just how long they can economically re-inject that gas, and I am wondering whether the minister has any idea as to what that length of time might be.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not have the technical data that is being requested by Senator van Roggen, and I am not sure that that data is available anywhere inside the Canadian government establishment, whether in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or anywhere else. I could make inquiries of some of the United States technical people, who probably do know. I have heard from reliable people, however, that, given the physical capability of the re-injection of that gas and the cost of compressing it so that it can be re-injected, it is getting to the point where, in respect of the production of oil at Prudhoe Bay, putting the gas into a pipeline for delivery to the United States would be by far the most economical and sensible way of handling it.

I would like to make one slight correction to Senator van Roggen's comments, and that is to say that it has not been anything that we failed to do in Canada that has held up the construction of this pipeline. We have been ready for many, many months to proceed with all of the commitments that we made. I made it clear to the United States congressional leaders, and to their secretary—and they acknowledged the truth of this—that the reason we are not on the targets that were set out in 1977 is the lack of action that was needed in the United States, not in Canada.

I would not want to leave the impression that we acknowledge that we have failed in any way to meet all of the commitments we made. Both our parliamentary and our regulatory authorities have been ready to go for many months, as well as Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd.

Senator van Roggen: Just to make my position quite clear, nothing in my remarks was meant to indicate that I felt that we in Canada had been in any way negligent in staying completely ahead of the United States throughout this whole period. I am simply saying that I would not want to see the negativeness I detect in some of the questions of the opposition result in our not being forthcoming at this particular time after the United States Congress and administration have been as forthcoming as they have been.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question again has to do with the reduction of the subsidy to the shipbuilding industry from 20 per cent to 9 per cent. This is a question I asked on June 19 and again last evening, and the minister now probably has an answer—but I think I can pre-empt him on it. I read in the Ottawa Citizen that a new program is to go into effect.

Could the minister go beyond that to allay the fears of the shipbuilding industry that this reduction will destroy their competitiveness in the international marketplace?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator will not pre-empt me by reading it in the Ottawa Citizen, because anyone could have read it in Hansard of the other place for July 7.

Senator Marshall: My copy of Hansard came late.

Senator Olson: As was stated by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, on July 7, the government intends to carry out extensive consultations with the industry, labour and the provinces with respect to the long-term future of shipbuilding in Canada. Honourable senators will appreciate that I would not wish to prejudice those discussions by speculating on the nature of the outcome of such consultations.

The Canadian shipbuilding industry is currently in a state of relative good health, with orders on the books to provide work well into 1981 in some cases, and until 1982 in others. I think, for example, of the Marystown shipyard, which is currently busy with construction of a replacement for the Cygnus fisheries patrol vessel, as well as new trawlers.

I would not want to add anything more to that. My honourable friend knows that there will be time for some consideration of this change, and in the meantime most of the shipyards in Canada, with one or two exceptions, are working at near-full capacity.

Senator Marshall: In spite of the assurance from the minister that the industry is in good health, that does not comply with the position of the president of the Canadian shipbuilding industry, who fears that the reduction of the subsidy will destroy the competitiveness of the Canadian shipbuilding industry.

Given the fact that the government is prepared to help Chrysler Canada to the tune of $250 million, and the Michelin Tire Company, can the minister explain why it is there is no apparent concern for the jobs lost as a result of the Canadian shipbuilding industry being non-competitive?

I appreciate that the minister has said that they now have contracts taking them into 1981 and 1982, but evidently the president of the shipbuilding industry does not share his view as far as the impact of this reduction is concerned.

Senator Olson: I guess the president can put any interpretation that he wants to on the situation, and I suppose my honourable friend can put his interpretation on it, as can the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I suppose if one wants to look far enough into the future, one can find some validity to that at some point in time.

It seems to me it is reasonably comforting to know that these shipyards will be busy well into next year, and beyond in many cases. Of further comfort is the commitment that has been made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to look into the matter. It may be that the shipbuilding industry does not need a subsidy of 20 per cent in perpetuity. I do not know that. It may be that it does require some subsidy so as to be competitive in the international marketplace.

It would be premature for me to discuss that in detail until the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has finished its survey of what is required. I am sure my honourable friend would not want us to subsidize that or any other industry beyond what is necessary to make the industry competitive.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SPACE RESEARCH

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development and it is in respect of Canada's space future. In January of this year the previous government announced a $43 million space science research program, to be spread over six years. Can the minister assure us that the cabinet is taking this matter into consideration and will approve such a program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I really cannot reply to that. My honourable friend knows that the cabinet announces decisions after they are made, not before.

Senator Yuzyk: But has the matter been considered at all up to the present time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not the practice of this government, nor any other government, to announce what is on the agenda for cabinet meetings.

Senator Smith: Oh, come on!

• (1450)

Senator Flynn: Why didn't you say you didn't know?

Senator Olson: Because I do know.

Senator Yuzyk: It is rather alarming to me because I would like to call to the attention of the government the fact that very recently Dr. Ian McDiarmid, associate director of the National Research Council, Herzberg Institute of Astrophysics, and director of its Space Science Co-ordination Office, stated that if the program is not approved soon "it will be almost equivalent to deciding that we do not want to do space science in this country for the next 10 years."

Senator Olson: Honourable senator, what you are really asking me to do now is comment on someone else's opinion. I am not in the habit of doing that. The commitment by the government is clear; it was in the Speech from the Throne. We are going to move it up from what it was then—it was, I think, about .9 per cent of GNE—to 1.5 per cent of GNE. We have some programs and some policies now under consideration to achieve the objective that was set out. We did not say we were going to do it in the next two or three months. So I guess my honourable friend will have to wait until the cabinet has made decisions before he can expect me to tell him what those decisions are. But for him to claim that someone else's opinion of what cabinet is doing is factual and not just an opinion, of course, is something that I cannot accept.

Senator Yuzyk: But this was the opinion of a leading scientist. I think we have to have a lot of patience to find out what the government intends to do in such important matters as this.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

MAJOR CHAIN STORES—ALLEGATIONS OF DEMANDS FOR REBATES FROM SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would the minister indicate if the government is intending to act on the request by the Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Institute that the issue of rebates being demanded of small manufacturers by both the Hudson Bay Company and the Simpson Company be investigated both from the perspective of the effect it is having on small industry and in terms of its cost to the consumer?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will have to take that question as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONFERENCE AT WOLFVILLE, NOVA SCOTIA—ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to my genial and eloquent friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to a very important Atlantic Canada conference on the Constitution of Canada held recently in Acadia University in Wolfville which was attended by all the maritime premiers and members of the Atlantic Progressive Conservative caucus including my colleague, Senator Smith. Can the minister indicate why no member of the government attended this significant gathering, or if it was ever suggested that senatorial members of the government or senatorial supporters of the government might attend and thus show Atlantic Canada a degree of interest in their contribution to a major national issue?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that that conference was held last weekend when there was another event of some national significance held in Winnipeg at which a great many Canadians gathered to discuss the problems of many parts of Canada including Atlantic Canada. There was difficulty for many of the ministers as a result of their efforts to attend the Atlantic conference.

Senator Macquarrie: Just for clarification, I was wondering about the attendance of members of the government during the two-and-a-half days before the Winnipeg conclave.

Senator Perrault: Of course, the Winnipeg conclave required a great deal of preparatory work.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC CANADA—PASSENGER AND FREIGHT FACILITIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I want to direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I should think that economic development in any country involves the transportation of people and goods in that country. This leads me to the question I want to pose to the minister. Of course, he will not have the answer today, but this will serve as notice to him.

I would like to know why VIA Rail is having to resort to hiring buses to transport people in the Atlantic region because their rail liners are so overcrowded. VIA Rail, at great cost, is hiring buses to transport people.

In the meantime Canadian National are stalling, as usual, with respect to transporting goods to the great province of Newfoundland by not having the necessary rolling stock located conveniently, and by having carloads of goods lying on sidings at the mainland ports while businessmen in Newfoundland are awaiting those goods that should be transported as quickly as possible.

In so many words, Mr. Minister, it would appear to me that Canadian National and VIA Rail are continuing a practice started some years ago. They are showing a profit and Dr. Bandeen boasts about it, but they are making it difficult for people to use, and so are discouraging them from using, Canadian National facilities. They are driving business away, and thereby reducing the need for rolling stock, freight cars and passenger cars to the point where they are reducing employment in that particular region of Canada. I know it is a difficult problem right across the country, particularly in the west in respect of the handling of wheat, and so on.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): As the honourable senator indicated, I would have to take this question as notice. It would be helpful if he could indicate to me—or send the information to my office—the places where this has happened, and I shall refer the question to the Minister of Transport who will provide an answer to it.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PORT HAWKESBURY AND GLACE BAY—REPORTED SHUTDOWN OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Muir's question of June 25 regarding the possibility of cutbacks in the production of heavy water at the Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay plants in Nova Scotia.

There has been no change in the situation since I replied to the same question of the honourable senator on June 11. I would like to take this opportunity to stress again that there are no plans to cut back on production at the heavy water plants in Nova Scotia.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Charbonneau's question of June 25 regarding renegotiation of the Canada-United States agreement on automotive products, referred to as the auto pact.

Over its term, the auto pact has been good for Canada, providing jobs for Canadian workers and ensuring the growth of a strong and competitive automobile industry in Canada despite some problems that have arisen, particularly in areas of parts sourcing, R&D and engineering.

I am sure the honourable senator is well aware that, at the present time, the automobile industry is facing a transitional period due to the very large increases in fuel prices in recent years and improved pollution and safety standards. It is a period wherein the industry is having to make very substantial investments in R&D, capital equipment and productivity improvement in order to ready the industry for the requirements of the rest of this century.

Ensuring that Canada and Canadian workers get a fair share of these developments is the reason why the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has initiated discussions with the Canadian and United States heads of the North American auto industry, and why the minister met with the United States special trade representative, Reuben Askew, in Washington recently—the same day that I was there, by the way. The minister, on July 2 in the other place, indicated that he "put our case forcefully" including the mix of automobile products to be manufactured in Canada in the post-transition period and the sourcing of auto parts in Canada.

● (1500)

I wish to note in this regard that during the Chrysler negotiations the federal government got new commitments from Chrysler on the sourcing of parts and materials as one of the several firm conditions for the loan guarantees to the company in 1982. It is the intention of this government to negotiate better operation of the auto pact, and while it is not desired, nor is there any intention, to seek a total renegotiation of the pact, there will be some changes to it. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has indicated that discussions will continue until we get the results that we are seeking in the interests of Canadian auto workers.

POST OFFICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of replies to questions asked in recent days. First of all, there was a question from Senator Doody on June 5, 1980, regarding the 37½-hour work week in the Post Office.

As part of normal operations volume, counts of mail entering and leaving postal plants are taken daily to assist management in such things as identifying and staffing peak periods. This system of monitoring mail flows should provide a good base for monitoring whether the productivity goals, negotiated with CUPW, are being met.

Insofar as changing the hours of work for supervisors is concerned, this is a negotiation item which comes under the authority of Treasury Board. Nevertheless, the Post Office and the Treasury Board will certainly consider the effect of this provision negotiated with CUPW in the current negotiations with the supervisory personnel bargaining unit.

The honourable senator also asked:

> I understand that this agreement by which 40 hours' work is to be done in a 37½-hour week is applicable to the postal workers, or at least to that unit covered by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Will the same circumstances and conditions be applied to other people employed by the Public Service directly, or by crown agencies, or is this to be specifically related to the Post Office and to no other area of government?

Here again the question of hours of work is a bargaining item under the authority of Treasury Board. It is reasonable to assume that bargaining units will continue to put forward such demands as they have in the past.

It should be pointed out, however, that the recently negotiated contract with CUPW recognizes that inside postal workers work in an industrial environment which is quite different from most other groups in the public service. For instance, such benefits as flexible hours are not available to workers in postal plants.

It should also be emphasized that the hours of work negotiated with CUPW are dependent on productivity. The government has made it clear it will not consider them to be an acquired right in future negotiations unless increased productivity is achieved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Marshall relating to the exemption of the $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement to war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients and the re-introduction of Bill C-28.

I am pleased to advise that the Governor in Council has authorized an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance Regulations, whereby the recent increase of $35 a month in the Guaranteed Income Supplement has been exempted as income for allowance purposes, effective July 1, 1980. I know all members of the Senate will welcome this announcement. This has been done to ensure that eligible war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients over the age of 65 benefit to the same degree as guaranteed income supplement recipients in general.

With reference to the re-introduction of Bill C-28, the minister, as a veteran, informs me that he was pleased with this legislation and proud that many of the measures contained in the bill were the result of initiatives he took when he was minister. He will soon be proposing legislative measures which will include his own priorities for veterans and their dependents.

Senator Flynn: Is that what they are discussing this afternoon?

Senator Perrault: Yes, I think it covers the same area. The reply has just been received, but you have it as it came from the minister. Very soon, he said.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ARTILLERY SYSTEMS—PARTICIPATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION (QUEBEC)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 18 there was a question asked by the distinguished Senator Macquarrie regarding the participation of Space Research Corporation in the International Conference on Artillery Systems. He asked on June 18 whether the government had any feelings of misgiving, or any sense that something inappropriate was taking place, in that the Government of Canada was "supporting the holding of a conference in the Ottawa Conference Centre."

The government believed that it was appropriate that the International Conference on Artilleries Systems take place in the Government Conference Centre. The conference was a technical one intended to examine where NATO was going in the area of large calibre ammunition. While this conference was organized with the help of the Canadian government, which clearly had an interest in and a responsibility for maintaining and modernizing defence forces of Canada, it was, in fact, arranged by the American Defence Preparedness Association (ADPA).

The invitations to the participating individuals and companies were issued by ADPA. I am told that scientists from Space Research Corporation (Quebec) (SRC(Q)), neither of whom have been found guilty in an American court of supplying arms to South Africa, were invited by ADPA because of their expertise in the subjects to be discussed. Their participation had no connection whatsoever with the issue involving SRC(Q) that is now the subject of legal proceedings in Canada. In this regard, the honourable senator may be aware that the Canadian government is at present examining the organization and the operations of SRC(Q) and some of its affiliated companies.

I want to take the opportunity to reiterate the wholehearted commitment of the Canadian government to the United Nations' embargo on the sale of military equipment to South Africa and its determination to enforce both the embargo and Canada's own laws.

Regarding the other aspect of the question, I do not believe that the government's commitment to seek international disarmament, which I also wish to reaffirm, is put in any doubt by its participation in a technical conference such as this. Indeed, the government believes it can pursue this commitment best through its NATO relationship.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MARIJUANA—NATIONAL EDUCATION PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Finally, I have a reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Haidasz on June 27 regarding marijuana prosecutions and the government's policy on the possession of marijuana.

The Attorney General of Canada has recognized the severity of a seven-year minimum jail sentence in those instances where small quantities of cannabis are brought into Canada unlawfully. Federal prosecutors are expected to exercise their discretion in the laying of charges for importing cannabis, and in those cases where small quantities are brought into Canada in circumstances that do not suggest a commercial venture the discretion may be exercised in favour of laying the lesser charge of possession or possession for the purpose of trafficking. In addition, an interdepartmental committee has been considering these and other questions concerning the law as it relates to cannabis.

Recommendations for changes may be expected in the near future. I do not know whether those recommendations will propose an "exact amount that will be regarded as possession for personal use only".

In the Toronto case used by the honourable senator to illustrate his point, the discretion had been exercised and a charge of possession for the purposes of trafficking was before the court. If convicted, the accused would have been liable to imprisonment for life. However, she gave evidence in the course of the trial to the effect that she had purchased the marijuana in Jamaica and was taking it to her home in Japan for her own personal use. The judge accepted her explanation and convicted her of possession, which is a lesser offence and carries a maximum penalty of seven years' imprisonment. The accused had been in custody for approximately two months awaiting trial and was sentenced to an additional three months' imprisonment. This was an unusual case and it is not certain that is provides compelling argument for the application of weight limits in possession offences, but I am given to understand that this is within the terms of reference of the interdepartmental committee.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to report on the possible date of commencement of the summer recess. I wish I had a final report, but I don't. However, I think it fair to give honourable senators notice of the present situation as we see it.

• (1510)

There is hope and some possibility of our rising for the summer recess at the end of next week—that is July 17 or 18.

I believe there is a concerted effort on both sides in the other place, and in this house too, to achieve that result. If I were forced to place a bet on it, I do not think I would place it at anything better than six to five, but there is that possibility, particularly because I believe the leaders in both houses and of all three parties hope to achieve that result.

If it looks as if that is indeed an achievable result, we will be asking honourable senators to sit possibly Monday evening or Tuesday afternoon of next week to enable us to get a good head start and to dispose of those bills that appear to raise no serious controversy on either side. We can then shoot for royal assent on either Thursday of Friday.

At present the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government and I have consulted daily on this subject, and following some conferences that are to take place in the House of Commons we should have a clearer picture by tomorrow's sitting. Therefore I shall advise honourable senators tomorrow as to whether we—that is the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government and I—believe we can complete our deliberations by the end of next week. I thought that honourable senators would like to have an indication of what we had in mind concerning the target date.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Thériault for second reading of Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not detain the house for any great length of time on this bill because I have no quarrel with the substance of the matter that is contained within it. It provides authority for an extension of the present Regional Development Incentives Act for a further period ending December 31, 1984.

It is of interest to note that this represents a change from the original bill introduced in the House of Commons, in which the termination date was 1986. I suspect the reason for the reduction in the term is because it is pretty generally recognized that it would be a good idea to have a complete review of the operation and principles of the Regional Development Incentives Act, and one way to insure that would be to put a relatively short term on its continued life. I must say that if that is the reason for reducing the term of the bill, I approve of it.

One of the committees of the Senate is at present investigating the whole question of DREE, which, of course, is involved with this piece of legislation. We are asking ourselves a number of questions about it. We are interested to know how we can approach some impartial assessment of the results that have been achieved, how we can decide which of the tools used in regional development are most effective, whether they can be improved, and if there are any that should be dropped. We are interested in the question of the value of subsidies by DREE compared to the principle of unsubsidized economic viability. We are interested in knowing whether the emphasis should be placed on small business development under this act—I myself think it should be—and to what extent it should be extended to cover larger industries, as it does from time to time.

We are also interested in the question of co-ordination between the DREE administration and other departments of the government, and whether the present arrangements put sufficient muscle in the hands of the DREE ministry in order to obtain the sort of co-ordination and co-operation that would be required to give full expression to the thrust of this act.

Although we have not yet got around to it, I suppose we are going to look at the size of the DREE budget. I believe it is a fact that over a period of time the percentage of the federal effort going into DREE has declined by almost a half. I believe it was 2.1 per cent in 1970 and 1.1 per cent in 1977. Surely that raises the question of whether this trend in policy is desirable.

All in all I consider it wise to have reduced the term of the bill. There are many good things that could be said about DREE, and many success stories could be quoted in all parts of the country as to the beneficial effect of the application of this statute. So I do not wish it to be understood by any that I am opposed to the principle and the thrust behind the Regional Development Incentives Act. I am not. It is a good principle.

I may also say that the pedigree of this idea probably goes back to the administration of the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. I recall his particular concern for the need of the Atlantic provinces of Canada to receive the fraternal support of their fellow citizens in the rest of the country. As time rolled by, the names were changed and the bills received different titles, but the principle was the same, that we were going to use our collective effort to improve the economic circumstances of other people in our country who would be entitled to that kind of help.

The question of the co-ordination of the federal administration of DREE and the provincial administrations, most of whom, if not all, run similar programs, is an important consideration. My impression so far is that there is remarkably good co-ordination between the federal administration and the provinces in this connection, and that DREE has gone to some effort to decentralize its activities to ensure that that kind of association is encouraged and developed.

So all in all I would say to honourable senators that I shall certainly vote for the bill. I think it is a good thing that the term of its life has been shortened, and I have some confidence that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which is seized of the matter under its very able Chairman, Senator Everett, will in due course produce some recommendations for the consideration of this house that will make this policy even more effective in the country.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I realize that we are running against time and there is a great deal to be done in the next few days if we are going to be able to recess before the end of the month. However, I should like to say a few words about this bill, as I have more than a passing interest in it.

His Honour the Speaker was the first minister of DREE in the Government of Canada, and I am sure he will recall I was the first minister of DREE in the Government of Newfoundland. I believe I had the honour of being one of the first to sign a DREE agreement, on behalf of the Province of Newfoundland, with the federal government.

Prior to that, as Senator Roblin has said, there were a number of programs which envisaged the DREE as we know it today. Sequentially there was the so-called FRED program. I have forgotten the full title from which that acronym was derived, but it was a program specifically designed to try to remove some of the inequities which existed in Canada. Prior to that there was the ARDA program and, before that, as Senator Roblin pointed out, there were a number of federal programs, not the least of which was the Roads to Resources Program initiated by the Diefenbaker government, which was also designed basically to relieve some of the inequities that existed across Canada. There were also a number of other programs.

We can all disagree on the details of the DREE program and, indeed, of the other federal-provincial programs initiated in the last 20 years or so. However, a person would have to be biased, short-sighted or, frankly, stupid to argue, as some have done—and they are not confined to any one political party—that the DREE program has been virtually useless. The DREE program has worked miracles in certain parts of Canada. Those of us who belong to the Atlantic provinces can point out specific example after example where the DREE program has transformed areas that formerly had known only privation, poverty and isolation, since one aspect of the DREE program has been the building of highways.

Senator Thériault, in his brief but very able introduction of this amendment, pointed out two of its essential characteristics. One is that it is important to continue programs such as DREE if we are going to see Confederation continue as many of us envisage it. Certainly, we in Newfoundland, who worked to join with Canada and to become a part of the Confederation process, must have programs of this kind, and they must not be rigid; they must be flexible because what is a disadvantaged area today may be a prosperous area tomorrow. I can remember, as a young man, when the most prosperous part of Canada today, the province of Alberta, was certainly not prosperous by any stretch of the imagination. The transformation that has taken place in Alberta in recent years could very well take place in other parts of Canada. In fact, it has already done so, although not so spectacularly. In the not too distant future, we may very well see a transformation of that kind in eastern Canada, particularly in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and perhaps all of eastern Canada, if the oil potential that we believe is there is realized.

The second important point made by Senator Thériault is that there must be some continuity and some logical plan. In Canada we all look forward with anticipation to the promised revision of the DREE legislation.

As I listened to Senator Thériault yesterday, and to Senator Roblin today, I was reminded of the famous dialogue contained in the latter part of Plato's dialogues where Socrates has a debate with one of his pupils on education and, as usual, there was disagreement on details. Socrates summed it up by saying that we may disagree on details; we have the right to do that, but we have to remember this: Education is a good thing and a necessary thing, and it is a duty of us all to support it. This great concept of removing regional disparity is, in my mind, implicit in DREE and is the very heart of Confederation. We have to remember that it is a good thing and it is our duty to support it.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Thériault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I listened very carefully to what Senator Roblin said, and I want to assure him that every point he made was a good one except, perhaps, the one in which he mentioned the name of Mr. Diefenbaker. However, now that he has passed on, I cannot see any harm in it.

Senator Walker: That is not funny.

Senator Thériault: It is not funny because I remember the day when there were hodge-podge ad hoc programs introduced on the spur of the moment until the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with His Honour the Speaker as minister.

Senator Roblin is right in saying that the reason for the extension being cut from five years to three years is because the members of the other house—and I think rightly so—want to be assured of a chance to review the whole program before the dissolution of this Parliament. I can tell Senator Roblin and other senators that I have a letter in my hand from the minister assuring this house of his entire co-operation and that of his officials in the higher echelons, and saying that they are at our disposal to discuss this matter and to hear our views. I hope that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which has undertaken a review of regional disparities, will advance some proposals and suggestions for a better and stronger department to the minister and his officials in order that they may convince the government of the importance of this department to the poorer parts of this country.

I am sure that all honourable senators are prepared to co-operate, and that this bill can proceed to third reading, with leave, now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, as I suggested I would earlier, I move, with leave, that this bill be now read a third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILLS TO AMEND—SECOND READINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to consider Orders 4 to 17 together:

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill C-268, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint Hyacinthe-Bagot); Bill C-402, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sarnia-Lambton); Bill C-488, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Rimouski-Temiscouata); Bill C-529, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington); Bill C-565, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Notre Dame de Grâce-Lachine East); Bill C-599, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Berthier Maskinongé-Lanaudière); Bill C-600, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Cochrane-Superior); Bill C-601, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Argenteuil-Papineau); Bill C-602, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Verdun-Saint Paul); Bill C-604, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Sainte Marie); Bill C-605, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Mercier); Bill C-606, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Richmond-Wolfe); Bill C-608, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montmorency-Orléans); and Bill C-609, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (La Prairie).

● (1530)

He said: First I thank honourable senators for allowing consideration of these bills en bloc, which is the way they were considered in the other place. I must follow that with an apology for the fact that we did not get copies of each bill printed for consideration today, because I suspect that some senators will want to refer to individual bills. Whether my suspicion is correct or not, as a matter of form they ought to be available for honourable senators to have that opportunity even if they decide not to seize it.

For that reason, I propose at this stage simply to suggest some reasons for favourable consideration for this block of bills, and then someone on the other side might wish to adjourn the debate. We could then deal with them by way of questions or comments. In any event, I propose, no matter how we proceed, to make some observations about them today.

[Senator Thériault.]

Honourable senators, each of these bills changes the name of an electoral district. The name to be changed was the name that was established during the last revision of the electoral boundaries and so persisted. They were the designations of those constituencies during the last election.

The reasons for the change of names do not appear in any detail in explanatory notes or otherwise for those constituencies with which I am personally familiar.

For those constituencies with which I am personally familiar I can see in many cases that the members of the House of Commons representing those constituencies feel that the names proposed more accurately describe the regions or areas that make up the constituencies they represent. That analysis is supported by the fact that in no case that I have noticed is the name of the constituency shortened; rather, in all cases it is lengthened. For example, there is before you a bill to change the name of the electoral district of Sarnia, and it is proposed that it be changed to Sarnia-Lambton. I am familiar with that constituency and I know that the County of Lambton lies just to the east of Sarnia and to the west of the County of Middlesex. There is a riding called Lambton-Middlesex and the border runs right down the middle of Lambton. I take it that the member for Sarnia wishes to make it clear that his riding consists of a good portion of the County of Lambton. I take it that that is an example of the motivation behind the suggested changes for names.

Honourable senators will notice that in one case, for example, Montreal is added to make it clear that a constituency is found in Montreal, although the name the constituency presently has would not disclose that fact.

I have no other information. I have not been individually briefed by the members of the House of Commons on why they want the names of these constituencies changed.

Here in the Senate, of course, except for Quebec senators, members of the Senate to not represent constituencies as such, but provinces. Quebec senators represent electoral divisions.

The blandishment that I hope will be successful in encouraging honourable senators do give quick approval to these bills is that this is something we are being asked to do by some of our colleagues in the other branch of Parliament, for reasons that I am sure are sufficient to them. I am equally sure that, in reverse circumstances, they would do the same for us.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

BANK ACT
QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is quite direct in form and simple in language. Its purpose is simply to extend the charters of the banks in Canada to November 30, 1980. It will do this whether the banks come under the provisions of the Bank Act or of the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

The reason is quite simple. The charters of the banks under the existing legislation expire on July 14. Consequently, they would no longer be chartered, were we to do nothing about it. This is, thus, a simple, direct provision to extend that term to November 30 next. I regret very much having to ask the Senate to pass such a measure, because it will be the fourth time we have had to extend the Bank Act in order to enable Parliament to get on with its revision.

● (1540)

By way of background, the revision process was started in 1976. It first appeared before the Senate in the form of Bill C-15, I think, and at a later time in the form of Bill C-14. It is now before Parliament in the form of Bill C-6.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has already done a great deal of work on the proposed revision of the Bank Act since it was first brought forward in 1976. I am happy to say that much of the work of that committee has been reflected in the bills which have replaced the original bill. As a matter of fact, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is meeting on this matter at this very moment.

Bill C-6 is before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the House of Commons. There are some amendments proposed to the existing bill. Of course, the Senate committee is studying the bill in anticipation of the Senate's receiving it, and in anticipation of its being referred to that committee.

I do not think there is anything more I can add. It is a self-evident problem. I commend the bill to the house.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I wish to join with my honourable and distinguished friend in supporting second reading of this bill. I should say that it is through no one's fault that this extension is required. Two elections have intervened which held up the passage of this very tortuous bill to revise the Bank Act and to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and so forth.

I have nothing further to say on the matter. The less said the better and the sooner we can get on with our job.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am in your hands, but I would ask leave of the Senate to move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJUSTMENT OF ACCOUNTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill C-22, to adjust the Accounts of Canada and to make related amendments to certain Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to make some comments on Bill C-22, to adjust the accounts of Canada. This bill is rather lengthy and a bit complicated, but the purpose of it is to implement a number of recommendations concerning technical accounting improvements to the Government of Canada's financial statements and to write off certain loans and other accounts.

In 1973, the Secretary of the Treasury Board undertook to implement a study of the accounts of Canada to resolve several technical accounting issues which had been discussed over the years in the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons, and raised by successive Auditors General. The study was completed in October 1975. Its 41 recommendations were accepted by the Treasury Board and by the cabinet, and were submitted to and approved by the Public Accounts Committee in March 1976.

Recommendations 10, 11 and 12 of the report, which are the primary subjects of this bill, redefine what constitutes an asset or liability of the Government of Canada. To meet this new definition, it will be necessary to write off certain items previously classified as assets, recognizing that in future they will be treated as expenditures rather than assets.

A three-stage technique has to be used to implement the necessary changes. In stage I, to reflect the changes in the government's financial statements at March 31, 1979, the Minister of Finance has exercised his authority under section 54(2) of the Financial Administration Act to "establish such reserves with respect to the assets and liabilities of Canada," as he feels are required to give a true and fair view of Canada's financial position. Stage II is the application of the portion of this bill which removes the legislative authority for the various accounts, funds and loans that are to be deleted. Stage III will be the application of the portion of this bill to delete amounts outstanding in the accounts of Canada as at March 31, 1981. Most of the deletion arises from the Unemployment Insurance Fund and the Airports Revolving Fund.

The exact amounts to be deleted will not be known until the actual balances at March 31, 1981 are established. The $3.8 billion estimate of the balance to be deleted that was quoted in the government release of April 29, 1980, was based on figures published in the Public Accounts for 1978-79. Since the press release, preliminary figures for the year 1979-80 have become available from the year-end accounting records and the estimate of the amount to be deleted can now be revised down to $3 billion. This change occurred because the government's cost of paying benefits to the Unemployment Insurance Fund was reduced by about $1 billion in fiscal year 1979-80 from what it was in 1978-79. This reduction in the government's cost of paying benefits was due to a new formula that increased the share of costs to employees and employers, reduced benefits paid because of some new rules, and a slight improvement in the rate of unemployment.

The objectives of this bill could have been met through special supplementary estimates followed by a special appropriation act, but because they are accounting adjustments rather than spending initiatives, and because they represent a significant change in accounting policy, it was felt that they would be better explained through a separate act. In keeping with this philosophy, it was decided to include in this bill only those items which had previously been agreed to and publicly acknowledged in the Financial Statements of Canada. Note 3 of the 1979 Public Accounts relates to recommendations 10, 11 and 12 of the study of the accounts, and to the write-off of certain loans which are included in this bill. A more detailed explanation of the major items is provided in the following paragraphs.

Unemployment Insurance: The largest amount involved relates to the Unemployment Insurance Account. At March 31, 1980 advances by the government and other current obligations to this fund were in the order of $1.6 billion. The advances to the Unemployment Insurance Account made by the government, to meet the expected cash requirements of the account at March 31, 1980, totalled $1,025 million.

A calculation was made of the government's cost of paying benefits for the calendar year 1979, plus January to March 1980. This total cost exceeded the advances by $574 million and is an obligation of the government to the Unemployment Insurance Account. The total amount of the required adjustment, therefore, is $1,025 million, plus $574 million, for a total of $1,599 million.

This adjustment has the effect of recognizing the government's total cost of paying benefits to the Unemployment Insurance Account up to March 31, 1980, and more adequately discloses the government's expenditures. Bill C-22 will obviate the need to make this kind of adjustment in the future since the proposed act will require that the government recognize as budgetary expenditures its cost of paying benefits to the Unemployment Insurance Account on a monthly basis.

The next largest amount involved relates to revolving funds and working capital advances. Under the present accounting method, the additional moneys provided by appropriations over revenues collected were treated as loans or advances, rather than expenditures of the government. The new method will recognize "advances" as budgetary expenditures at the time they occur, instead of treating them as non-budgetary loans. It is now necessary to delete the outstanding balances of all such accounts effective March 31, 1981, and that is one of the purposes of the bill. The total of these balances as at March 31, 1980 was $859 million, and they involved some 56 separate accounts belonging to 17 different departments.

The only significant addition in Bill C-22 over its predecessor, Bill C-13, is that part coming under the heading "Authorization for Certain Revolving Funds" and comprising clauses 22 to 33. Generally, parliamentary authority for revolving funds not originally authorized in specific legislation would be approved or rescinded through supplementary estimates. However, because of difficulties associated with co-ordination and timing between supplementary estimates in fiscal year 1980-81 and Bill C-22, it was considered appropriate to include the rescinding of all previous revolving fund authorities and to establish new revolving funds in this bill. It is intended that future amendments to the revolving fund authorities set up by this bill will receive parliamentary authority through supplementary estimates. Consequently, a special clause is included in this bill to facilitate amendment by an appropriation act.

Another amount to be adjusted relates to unamortized bond flotation costs. The balance of unamortized flotation costs of $140 million for bond issues prior to 1977 needs to be deleted from the Accounts of Canada.

A fourth major item to be adjusted arises from loans totalling $387 million made to finance certain types of capital expenditures for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Capital Commission, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. Payments of principal and interest on these loans have not been made since March 31, 1975, the reason being that, commencing on that date, any new capital expenditures have been treated as normal budgetary expenditures of the government. These old loan balances have continued to be carried as assets in the Accounts of Canada pending the granting of parliamentary authority to delete and recognize them as expenditures.

In addition to these assets there are also some liabilities of the government that must be removed to correct the accounting and improve the accountability to Parliament. These special accounts, previously shown as liabilities in the Public Accounts, were in essence special accounts where the agency concerned deposited its appropriation and revenue accrued through sales in order that these funds not lapse at the end of the fiscal year.

In conclusion, it is emphasized that this bill does not propose any new expenditures of cash. The bill seeks to implement recommendations of the Study of the Accounts of Canada approved by the Treasury Board and the cabinet of the previous government, and which have been endorsed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, as I rise to speak on Bill C-22, to adjust the Accounts of Canada and to make related amendments to certain acts, I do so in the knowledge that this bill has been agreed to by all members of the other place and now comes to us with minor amendments.

Bill C-22 can technically be called a housekeeping bill since what it does, in effect, is to correct a group of accounting errors, and it results in the treating of some amounts of public expenditure as expenditures and removing them from listings of assets in the Public Accounts, where they have been year after year.

To be able to accept the writing-off of approximately $4 billion as housekeeping or accounting adjustments, or errors in bookkeeping, demonstrates how fully we have come to accept the magnitude of the amounts of money being moved about by governments in this present era.

Bill C-22 is a move in the right direction, at least as far as proper accountability of government to Parliament is concerned. It is quite obvious to all of us that expenditures should be treated as expenditures. The moneys have been spent, and we should not be told that they are recoverable loans or advances. This is particularly true of the amounts advanced by the government to cover claims paid by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, a subject mentioned earlier. These are statutory obligations of the Government of Canada, and why they should be called advances or loans on a year-to-year basis escapes me.

Perhaps in closing the debate on the motion for second reading, the sponsor of the bill in the Senate could provide us with some information on the writing-off of the loan to the CBC. This is a mystery, but I am sure there is a reasonable explanation for it. The people of Canada, through the government, pick up the deficits or losses of the CBC, and why this particular amount should be written off while we pick up the losses further down the road is something of a mystery. Perhaps we could be given an explanation of that at some point in time.

The Study of the Public Accounts of Canada was commissioned in 1973, with the report being tabled in 1975, and we only now have a bill before the Parliament to correct the obvious. There are many other areas in the Public Accounts which are, to be charitable, in error, or at least suspect, and I alluded earlier to one such area, that being pension fundings. There are contingent liabilities in the Public Accounts which are not covered properly; there are loans to foreign countries which are listed as assets and which, in reasonable and responsible accounting, should not be called assets of the Government of Canada or the people of Canada. There are many other areas in the Public Accounts which probably should be looked at in a far more serious light than they have been hitherto.

It is vital to the people of Canada, to the accounting principles of Canada, and to the responsibility of the public that a reasonably detailed accounting be made to Parliament in respect of the amounts of money that are spent. These bookkeeping sleights of hand should really be put aside. They are beneath the dignity of Parliament.

Perhaps the recent appointment of a permanent Comptroller General might go a long way toward correcting these things. I hope that the gentleman gets the co-operation he will need to make the necessary improvements and corrections. In any event, since this bill will add a further $4 billion to the true national debt of the country—and this we have done in the past two days—it does demonstrate the obvious shortcomings in our accounting system, and perhaps it is time to commission another study of the accounting system in place in Canada. The last full study was done around 1920, and we had this partial one in 1973 resulting in the half dozen or so improvements included in this bill. Perhaps the time has come to recommend a detailed upgrading and remodelling of the accounting system in place in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I inquire whether it is the intention of the sponsor to refer the bill to the National Finance Committee.

Senator Barrow: That was not my intention.

Senator Roblin: May I suggest that that might be advisable. It is a very complicated bill and there is a lot in it. I, for one, would recommend that it be referred to the National Finance Committee for examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you making a motion?

Senator Roblin: I operate as always on the principle of persuasion. I am trying to persuade my honourable friends to adopt the idea as their own.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just as Senator Roblin would like a committee to consider the bill, I would like to consider his proposal that it go to committee, and have a chance to speak to the chairman of the committee with reference to the time schedule. Otherwise I agree in principle with Senator Roblin, and would ask the sponsor of the bill to stand it or to move that it receive third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, and we can make inquiries in the meantime.

Senator Barrow: I move that it stand until the next sitting.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could not just allow the matter to stand without reference to third reading, because once that is on the record then that becomes and order of the house. I appreciate my honourable friend's desire to consult, and I certainly agree with that. Perhaps the best way would be just to allow the matter to stand. It has been suggested that the mover of the motion for second reading should move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Barrow: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Barrow, debate adjourned.

SALTFISH ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau moved the second reading of Bill C-7, to amend the Saltfish Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-7 is legislation to amend the Saltfish Act, an act under which the Canadian Saltfish Corporation has been granted a monopoly of the trade in cured codfish produced in Newfoundland and Labrador and on the lower north shore of Quebec. There are two provinces involved here, and each province has supporting legislation.

The purpose of Bill C-7 is to increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation from $15 million to $30 million. The $15 million ceiling has been sufficient for the corporation in past years—sometimes lean years, when we consider the mid-1970s. But conditions have changed since that time and the Atlantic fisheries are now prospering, particularly because we now have control over our fish stock in the 200-mile zone. Foreign fishing fleets which had depleted our stocks are now being restricted, and cod stocks are being rebuilt. This means, of course, that we now have more fish and this is particularly true with the northern cod stocks. Our scientists foresee a great increase in the supply of saltfish products, especially from the northern cod stocks which were so heavily overfished by foreign ships until 1977.

In 1970 when the Canadian Saltfish Corporation was established, its borrowing ceiling was $10 million. By 1976 this amount was insufficient and the ceiling was raised to $15 million, but with the expected increase in codfish this amount will not adequately service the demand for borrowing that is anticipated.

Projections by our scientists show that codfish landings from both inshore and near-shore operations alone would be more than 200,000 tonnes by 1985 or earlier in Newfoundland alone. That is not taking into account the Quebec catch nor does it take into account our offshore fleet. If there is a substantial catch there, the total amount would be twice what we are now landing.

Almost everyone agrees that the present markets made up chiefly of those in the United States are not flexible enough for a supply of that size in frozen product forms, and this also applies to other potential markets. We have, of course, the alternative to those frozen products in the form of cured codfish. There are many private firms that make up the frozen fish sector of the industry in Newfoundland, and they foresee cured codfish as the alternative.

The country is now looking for new markets in codfish products. Some of these markets are in southern Europe, in countries which had their own home-based fleets in Canadian waters before we declared our 200-mile zone in 1977. Some of these countries are familiar with cured codfish, and like the product. If the present projections are valid—and we believe they are—it will be necessary to double the salt and dried cod production over the next five years which would amount to approximately 20,000 tonnes per year.

Honourable senators, I am sure you recognize that these figures mean a large increase in the amount of borrowing that will be required by the corporation to meet the new demands placed on it. Codfish production will be double its present volume by the mid-1980s. In addition to that there is an increase in the price of raw materials and processing charges which amount to some 5 or 6 per cent per year, and, as is the case in most businesses, inflation, of course, has added to the corporation's problems.

The volume of product flow will require adequate storage capacity, and working capital will be needed to purchase and handle the expanded production into the mid-1980s. The corporation supplies salt to fishermen and advance loans to outfit boats and obtain fishing gear. The peak borrowing needs for working capital usually occur in October, and it is important that this legislation be passed before that time.

The corporation engages private firms as its agents to assemble, process and store the supply of cod which it handles.

[Senator Cottreau.]

During the time of decline of the codfish resources in the 1970s, prior to Canada's declaration of the 200-mile zone, it was the corporation that kept many of these firms alive. Many of the fishermen living along the Quebec north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence have a great dependence on the corporation. They fish from isolated communities in small open boats, and rely on the cod fishery for the greater part of their living. Since 1971 the corporation has been the only purchaser of salt cod produced on the north shore, thus playing an important part in the economic stability of the area.

The corporation is a non-profit organization, and over the past seven years its aggressive marketing policy has meant an increase of more than 200 per cent in the price of salted fish paid to the small boat fishermen.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I hope this bill will meet with your approval and that you will give it your wholehearted support so that the act can be amended and the corporation's borrowing ceiling raised to $30 million.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am pleased to reply to the introduction of Bill C-7 by Senator Cottreau, and to congratulate him on his succinct explanation of the bill which, as he indicated, would increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation from $15 million to $30 million. To one who has read the debates in the other place on the bill, it is obvious there was general agreement on its passage. It was first introduced by the previous administration under the Minister of Fisheries, the Honourable James McGrath, who, on behalf of the official opposition two days ago, gave approval to increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, and the bill passed all stages in a very short period of time.

Having followed the activities of the corporation since its establishment in 1970, I have no hesitation in suggesting that we in this house should pass the bill without referral to a committee, in the interests of the segment of the fishing industry that will continue to benefit.

Honourable senators, one does not hear too much about saltfish these days, but, as reflected in the need to double the borrowing authority, it has become a very important export commodity for Newfoundland and Quebec. The product has had its ups and downs over the years. Not too many years ago the inshore fishermen, isolated from the markets by outmoded methods and painstaking labour, had to cut, split and dry the codfish, and sell or barter the product for a few pennies per pound, or indeed keep it for food.

Salt cod was traditionally considered an inexpensive food. However, the steady increase in raw fish prices, the changing trend from fishermen's produced fish to agent's produced fish, thus causing extra cost, the increased cost of salt and other means of processing, have changed this concept, and saltfish has, as have other fish products, become considerably more costly. It is still, however, a very good buy considering the food value.

Certain markets are already showing some resistance to increased prices, and therefore the corporation must obtain more raw material of proper quality and large size for the more lucrative markets in order to remain viable and to increase its influence and volume in the more desirable markets.

As Senator Cottreau mentioned, the Canadian Saltfish Corporation was established in 1970 and given the monopoly over the trade in saltfish produced in Newfoundland and Labrador, as well as the lower north shore of Quebec. I must say, honourable senators, that today it is one of the few successful crown corporations, and I feel it appropriate to pay a tribute to its first and founding president, Mr. Arden Maloney, who has been responsible for the steady progress of the corporation, which has done much for the inshore fishermen in the province of Newfoundland.

One of the obstacles the corporation encountered was difficulty in obtaining sufficient quantities of saltfish for export markets. This was due to the increase in the price to fishermen of fresh cod. Instead of going through the painstaking process of processing it, they were able to sell it to the buyer at a pretty good price, and this made it easier for the fishermen to dispose of their fresh cod, instead of going through that process of drying.

It is interesting to note that since the corporation was set up sales have increased from $6.8 million in 1971 to $24 million in 1979, and it is expected that this figure will grow even more, hence the need to increase the borrowing authority.

Certainly an aspect that will affect its growth is the fact that with the recovery of fish stocks, the United States, which at one time took between 80 and 85 per cent of our fresh frozen product, is now taking advantage of the lucrative fishing grounds, and they will not now require as much of our fresh fish, so it is to Canada's advantage, through the corporation, to encourage the processing of saltfish and improve its marketability.

The other problem with which the corporation was faced had to do with the quality of the product, to meet competition from other countries, such as Iceland and Norway, which enjoy tariff-free entry to the European Economic Community.

The quality problem tends to be defined in certain markets, but now one of the trends is that they are looking for a larger fish, so we have to be interested in the size. This is the sort of product which is attractive to consumers in the importing countries, the trend being to dried heavy salted codfish, which is a rather new product. For example, Puerto Rico continued to be the corporation's most important market, although more emphasis is put on expanding other markets by penetrating the countries where it previously sold little or nothing.

In this respect, the corporation is now reasonably well established in the Italian market with dried heavy salted codfish, which is a rather new product in that market. This market previously only bought from Canada the traditional light salted codfish. The corporation's re-entry into the Spanish market for heavy salted dried fish appears to be an established fact.

The corporation also continues to hold its position in the northern part of Brazil. Its position in the West Indies is solid in some islands but insecure in others, due basically to internal politics and depressed living standards.

It is therefore important that one of the priority objectives of the corporation should now be to continue to find new markets and to improve the quality of its product.

The corporation also continues to be hampered by a large proportion of small fish and very few large and extra large. Although there appears to have been some improvement in quality, there is still a long way to go, even ignoring the problems of small and extra small trap codfish. Little can be done about this because of fishing methods. Fishermen's split and cured fish continues to be of generally better quality than fish split by machines in the plant. The lack of large fish prohibits the corporation from entering such lucrative markets as southern Brazil, and also expanding to a greater extent in markets such as Spain, Portugal and Italy.

Another problem has to do with the selling prices, which, although higher than last year, did not increase to the same extent as prices for fresh and frozen fish. Most of the corporation's contracts were in United States funds, and thus it enjoyed a beneficial currency exchange rate.

All in all, the corporation has done a reasonably adequate job, in taking a product which was confined to little areas of Newfoundland and northern Quebec, and establishing markets which can continue to grow to the benefit of the fishermen in those provinces.

I feel it is vitally important that the corporation be allowed to extend its borrowing authority, and I have no hesitation in recommending that the bill receive second and third readings and be passed today.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau moved with leave, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be now read the third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

LIVESTOCK FEED ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 25, the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill C-15, to amend the Livestock Feed Assistance Act.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, in speaking to Bill C-15 I would say, first, that my party endorses, within the context of this act, the principle that northern Canada should enjoy benefits comparable to eastern Canada and British Columbia. Accordingly, we on this side will support Bill C-15.

In my remarks, I should first address the incongruity that the north should not have been accorded, when the act was first introduced, assistance similar to that available elsewhere in Canada. Certainly, the Progressive Conservative Party has been on record for some years as endorsing the extension of the Livestock Feed Assistance Act to the north. The Yukon Territorial Council long ago requested such an extension. Finally, it took the intervention of the Department of Northern Affairs to persuade this government, in the dying days of its previous incarnation, to introduce such a measure. True to our commitment, we reintroduced Bill C-9, but enjoyed too little time in office to secure its passage. We are pleased that this government has seen fit to smile graciously upon northern Canada so early into its mandate.

Let no honourable senator be misled as to the impact of this act. The government will pay approximately 30 per cent of the transportation costs of livestock feed to northern Canada, amounting to about $50 per metric ton on a current transportation cost of $160 per metric ton. Inasmuch as cheaper access to feed engenders the development of a local livestock industry, northerners will benefit both from cheaper and fresher food being available. It is hoped, of course, that shipment of the feed will contribute to the establishment of a local grain industry. There are 3,000 to 4,000 square miles that have the capacity to produce grain for forage in the north, and with summer daylight hours as long as they are, the potential for growth, if cultivation takes place, is impressive.

There are, however, problems which arise from the extension of this policy. The government will have to monitor its application to ensure that local grain growers are not undercut by an influx of cheaper grain. The government, to give effect to its policy, will also have to improve transportation and distribution systems in the north. They are woefully poor at the moment, causing an official of the Livestock Feed Board, appearing before a committee of the other place, to admit that it may be necessary to truck grains in from Alberta, as the existing transportation system might be unable to accommodate the increased demand.

Honourable senators, in the light of these facts, it would be very unfortunate if the government were to decide, upon passage of this bill, that it had done its bit for the development of northern agriculture. Certainly the government has studied to death the future of agriculture in northern Canada. One could almost argue that had they long ago introduced the comprehensive policy which is so desperately needed, the bill which we are debating today would be unnecessary.

It is regrettable that in some respects Liberal policy has directly worked against the prosperity of northern agriculture. Certainly the closing of certain Department of Agriculture experimental stations in the north has lent that appearance. So what the government must do is put into effect a program which would realize the potential for production in the area, as part of an overall assistance package. In fact, the government once received a request from the Yukon Council not to proceed with this bill until an overall northern agricultural policy had been proclaimed.

It is now time that this piecemeal approach end. A comprehensive package must address those transportation and distribution problems to which I have already referred. It must also strive to assist in the creation of an early self-sufficient northern agricultural industry, and in doing so the government will absolutely have to permit the development of agricultural and recreational land in the territories.

The previous government, sympathetic to the aspirations and desires of northern Canadians, had taken some of the wraps off of such development, effective this summer. The new Liberal administration has decided not to proceed in this regard.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Sherwood: While sharing your concerns about the rapidity of development, we believe that northerners deserve the opportunity to more closely meet their own demands with local produce, and we believe that outstanding concerns can be met through the judicious application of regulations. Realistically, honourable senators, if development of the north does not become a priority of this government, then such harmless legislation as we are now debating will have very little impact upon the achievement of its stated goals.

With the indulgence of honourable senators, I would like to tackle one final but very fundamental problem arising from the introduction of this bill. It is a matter which I fear either the government has failed to consider, or, alternatively, has already passed judgment upon, to the detriment of western Canada.

To paraphrase the Minister of Agriculture, this program is designed to tide each region over until it becomes self-sufficient in livestock, and hence forage, production. To that end, the province of Quebec benefited last year from $4.5 million in federal funding under this act. The maritime provinces received almost $4 million, while British Columbia got $4.6 million. So-called "top-loading" subsidies by more prosperous provinces, designed to enhance still further the development of local livestock industries, have caused an even greater proportion of the livestock industry to move from western Canada to other parts of the country.

The point I wish to make, honourable senators, is that while the extension of the provisions of this act to the north is the only equitable way to proceed, given that other regions of the country are benefiting perhaps the rationale for the act itself should come under closer scrutiny. Since the inception of the Canadian Livestock Feed Assistance Board in 1967, western Canada's proportion both of the livestock and slaughterhouse industries has declined considerably. While the differential has narrowed, freight rates still heavily encourage the movement of unprocessed or semi-processed foodstuffs from west to east. The west still pays a transportation premium for finished products travelling in the other direction. While other regions are benefiting from self-sufficiency, or are approximating that objective, the west's competitive advantage in livestock production has been reduced.

I hasten to add that this would not be a problem if the government had policies in place designed to promote regional self-sufficiency in every endeavour. Allowing that such an objective would be ridiculous and counterproductive in terms of our international competitive position, I nevertheless point out that I have seen no federal policies designed to equalize automobile or textile manufacture across our regions.

Accordingly, I would urge the government, given the era of renewed federalism which has dawned upon this country, to review the overall impact of programs such as this, which may, quite understandably, contribute to the alienation which exists today in western Canada. At the very least, the inclusion of some western representation on the board's advisory committee would be a start.

• (1630)

With that request for the sort of fundamental review for which this government is not particularly known, yet expressing my sincere hope that a few months in opposition has increased its sensitivity, I conclude my remarks by reiterating our support for the passage of Bill C-15.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in Senator Hays' name, I move, with leave, that this bill be read a third time now.

Senator Roblin: Is it not the intention to refer this bill to committee?

Senator Frith: The Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Senator Hays, and the Vice-Chairman, Senator Sherwood, consulted on that possibility. There was a time when they thought they would like that to happen in order to have a review of the whole principle as suggested by Senator Sherwood. After further discussion, they decided they would postpone that to some other occasion. Therefore, they do not feel it is necessary for this bill to be referred to committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Friday, June 27, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the report be now adopted.

He said: As honourable senators may remember, about a month ago the joint chairman, Senator Godfrey, presented a report on the same subject matter as the present report which, incidentally, may be found in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 27 at page 221. At that time the terms of the report were much broader than, apparently, had been the intention of the committee. The subject of the report was authorization to send members of the joint committee to a meeting of the committees on Subordinate Legislation of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth to be held in Canberra, Australia, from September 29 to October 3, 1980.

The original report asked for authority to send members of the committee to Australia and elsewhere, as I remember. Although I am not quoting the report verbatim, that was its meaning. The Senate, as you will remember, asked that the matter be referred back to committee for reconsideration. The committee has now reconsidered, and has presented the report which, as I have said, appears at page 221 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and which is before honourable senators today.

The substance of the committee's report is as follows:

> That it be given authority to send five (5) members of the Committee and one (1) Committee Counsel to the conference of the committees on Subordinate Legislation of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth to be held in Canberra, Australia from September 29 to October 3, 1980.

Honourable senators will recall that under rule 83sca the actual expenses of such a trip if the report is adopted by the Senate, are subject to examination by the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 10, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

July 10, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 10th day of July, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-40, to amend the Pension Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that the bill be read a second time later this day.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is this the bill demanded by the Honourable Stanley Knowles?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): So they say. We do not say that, but they do.

An Hon. Senator: We should not trust rumours.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the following documents:

Report of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 20(1) of the Atomic Energy Control Act, Chapter A-19, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Northern Canada Power Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 24 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, Chapter N-21 and section 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copy of Eighth Report of the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service, dated March-April 1980.

And, in the spirit of access to information and freedom of information, I table a document entitled:

Copies of document entitled "Cabinet Committee Membership," dated July 10, 1980.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It follows upon a delayed answer he gave to a question I asked on June 25. The minister asserted:

> It is the intention of this government to negotiate better operation of the auto pact, and while it is not desired, nor is there any intention, to seek a total renegotiation of the pact, there will be some changes to it.

May I ask the minister what assurances he has that there will be changes in the auto pact? Have the U.S. authorities agreed in principle to such changes or is this just wishful thinking on the part of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? If they have agreed in principle on certain changes, might we know what areas these changes will cover?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not engage in wishful thinking; he is very sincere in negotiating an improvement in the auto pact. Although I cannot now inform my friend on the state of those negotiations, I will find out whether there is any more precise information than I have given him. The minister was in Washington the same day that I was there and there were negotiations going on for most of the day. Specifically, with respect to my friend's inquiry about what changes the United States has agreed to, if indeed any changes have been agreed to at this point in time, I think I had better obtain a report from the minister.

• (1410)

Senator Charbonneau: If I may ask a supplementary, is the minister telling us that changes have been agreed to at this specific time?

Senator Olson: All the minister said, and I understood it quite clearly, was that he was going to make an inquiry about the matter.

UNITED STATES—PRESIDENTIAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF ASSISTANCE TO AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to address another question to the minister relating to the automobile industry. It arises out of the announcement made by President Carter the other day of rather massive assistance of various kinds to the automobile industry in the United States.

While I am not suggesting that a program of that kind would necessarily be appropriate here, I did want to ask what the Minister of State for Economic Development is doing in conjunction with the industry, and perhaps with concerned provincial governments, to develop a longer-term strategy for this industry, since I think he will agree, as most people would, that the problems in the industry are not simply temporary or cyclical in nature.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure the Honourable Senator Murray knows quite well that the Minister of State for Economic Development does not administer any department, or, indeed, any program. Nor is he attempting to run any other minister's department.

Senator Flynn: Then what does he do?

Senator Olson: He has enough to do.

Senator Walker: Just answer the question.

Senator Olson: The function now of the Minister of State for Economic Development, as was the case during the time of my predecessor, is to perform a co-ordinating role in making sure that the economic policies of all the economic departments are co-ordinated in advance—

Senator Flynn: It doesn't show!

Senator Olson: —and, indeed, to follow that up with the expenditure management section, for which I wish to compliment my predecessor who put it in place, to make sure that those policies are carried out according to the will of the committee of which the minister is chairman.

Senator Murray: I am sorry, but that simply will not do for an answer, because if there is a classic case in which the plight of an industry is the concern of several departments of government, all of them falling under the aegis of economic development, it is this one.

I simply put the question to the minister whether, in his co-ordinating role, he is not bringing together the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for example, Finance, for example, and several others that are members of his committee, to try to work out a longer-term strategy for this industry. It seems to me that this is a classic case for the concern of a minister charged with co-ordinating economic policy.

Without being personally offensive in any way, I must say that if the minister persists in this kind of answer I will suggest that we ask for some kind of written documentation before this body so that we can know whether the Ministry of State for Economic Development is in fact an effective working portfolio or whether it is simply an empty title.

Senator Perrault: Very effective! Very effective!

Senator Olson: Honourable Senator Murray has that option open to him any time he wants to take it, and I hope he will not refrain from taking the option because of any admonitions from me, if he feels he ought to do so.

I can tell him, however, and I find it rather difficult that he does not seem to understand even the simplest language, that I am not running the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I have no intention of attempting to usurp that position now or ever.

There is a co-ordinating role at times that the Minister of State for Economic Development can play, and he is playing it—

Senator Perrault: Very well!

Senator Olson: —and will continue to play it on a low-profile basis, because he is not running and is not going to appear to run any other minister's department, either. I cannot understand why my friend cannot understand that. It is simple and straightforward, and there are no weasel words in that reply.

● (1415)

Senator Murray: I put it to the minister, then, that he is denying responsibility for the automobile industry, except as a matter of collective responsibility as a minister of the Crown; and that as Minister of State for Economic Development he is saying that he has no responsibility for developing a strategy in that area.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that interpretation of what I said would have exactly the same kind of credibility as, I suppose, the honourable member's interpretation of how to run the Conservative campaign—and he knows the results.

Senator Perrault: They ran out of gas.

Senator Smith: There is no danger of the honourable gentleman's running out of gas.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

HIRING OF CONVICTED WATERGATE CONSPIRATOR

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. In its issue of June 27, the Toronto Star published a story under the heading "Morningside hires Watergate's Liddy." The story reads in part as follows:

> Convicted Watergate conspirator G. Gordon Liddy bounded out of a jail term into the waiting arms of CBC-Radio.
>
> Morningside has picked Watergate's notorious master plumber to comment regularly during the Republican and Democratic conventions in the United States this summer, and to report on the fall presidential campaign trail.

I presume this is the justification, for it goes on to say:

> Liddy organized break-ins at the office of the National Democratic Committee headquarters in the Watergate complex in Washington and at the office of Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist. Morningside hired Liddy after he appeared on the program recently promoting his book, Will. In it, he expresses no regrets about his role in the Watergate scandal and reveals that he was ready to kill syndicated columnist Jack Anderson, one-time friend Howard Hunt, and John Dean. He confirms once telling a senior White House aide, "If you want anyone killed, just let me know." And he sticks to this view of life, "The end justifies the means. Extreme measures require and justify extreme means."

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Is this story correct? Has the CBC in fact hired this disreputable fellow to report on the forthcoming political campaign in the United States? If so, what are the terms of his engagement? Finally, can the CBC justify an engagement of this kind?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Goldenberg poses an interesting and important question. Certainly inquiries will go forward to obtain the information he seeks. In the meantime, I hope that tape recordings are made of all of Mr. Liddy's broadcasts and there will be no blanking out of any of them.

HUMAN RIGHTS

STATUS OF NATIVE WOMEN

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that the case of Sandra Lovelace is about to come before the United Nations, and given that on Monday in the other place the minister said that the Indian women might have to wait an additional two years for a resolution of this matter, despite the commitment of the Clark government of last fall to delete section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, would the Leader of the Government bring to the Senate a progress report on discussions which the government is having with native people to arrive at a new policy on the question of human rights for native women?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward immediately on that question.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NEW YORK STATE—DISCRIMINATORY LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my question is to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Two or three days ago the Minister of Industry and Tourism of Ontario requested the support of the federal government in opposing the recently passed New York law which discriminates against foreign steel supplies. Is the minister able to tell the Senate if that matter is being discussed between our government and the U.S. government? Can he also tell us whether, during the Prime Minister's recent visit with the President of the United States in Venice, discussions of this matter took place?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will make some inquiries in an effort to determine the stage of the discussions at this time. However, I can tell my honourable friend that the Canadian government is disturbed at this kind of action and some discussions are in progress. I will report on this later.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator van

Roggen's question yesterday concerning the re-injection of gas at Prudhoe Bay. I am advised that Arco has no immediate concern with the re-injection process, according to one of their spokesmen. It is their feeling that using some of the gas as the fuel to re-inject could continue until at least 1986 if no new reserves are found. They are continually studying the field at Prudhoe Bay.

If it eventually becomes uneconomic to use gas as the fuel of injection, the company will turn to other methods such as the waterflood method. The situation is being carefully studied and monitored constantly by the producers at Prudhoe Bay.

As a point of information, using gas to re-inject causes a loss of pressure annually, which requires an increase in compression resulting in a five per cent loss of energy.

THE ENVIRONMENT

CONVERSION OF U.S. ELECTRICITY GENERATING STATIONS—POTENTIAL INCREASE IN AIR POLLUTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have two brief statements on matters of interest to honourable senators. The first relates to acid rain. Honourable senators may be aware that the U.S. Senate has approved a bill providing for reduction of U.S. reliance on foreign oil through conversion of some oil-fired plants to coal.

This bill will be subject to further consideration by the House of Representatives. Thus far the House has not shown enthusiasm for the proposal, and a number of House Committees have indicated they will hold careful hearings before they agree to vote on it.

Canadian concerns about the increase in acid rain causing pollutants associated with this proposal have been made known to senior members of the U.S. Administration a number of times in recent months. A detailed expression of these concerns was also provided to the Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and relayed to many other members of Congress.

The government will continue to make its concerns on this proposal known to the U.S. government.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FISHERIES—EAST COAST BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The next matter I wish to deal with relates to fisheries. Honourable senators, formally and informally, have asked questions relating to the possibility of a settlement of the east coast fisheries dispute.

As far as Canada is concerned, the East Coast Fisheries Agreement, signed in March 1979, provided for a fair and comprehensive settlement of the issues under dispute. We do not know how long it will take for the U.S. to ratify the treaties.

In the meantime we have to protect Canadian interests as best we can. This is why the government announced, on June 12, an increase of Canadian fishing for groundfish on Georges Bank. We are presently considering what other measures might be necessary to protect our interests.

FISHERIES

1980 SEAL HUNT—DYE-MARKING OF SEAL PUPS

Question No. 11 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. During the 1980 seal hunt were any seals dye-sprayed by members of the Greenpeace organization or by others and, if so, were those persons apprehended?

2. When will the final results of the effects of dye-spraying of seals during the 1980 seal hunt be known?

3. Give details of the effect on seals if sprayed with large quantities of dye, if results of examination are available.

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

1. On March 13, 1980, Greenpeace claimed that six of its members had marked 150 seals with green dye during the previous day.

It appears that a total of two seal pups were surreptitiously marked either with a crayon or "magic marker" by five individuals while pretending to pet or stroke the animals. This took place on an offshore patch of ice holding a total of 38 to 40 seal pups, which had been designated by the Fisheries Officer in charge of Conservation and Protection at the Magdalen Islands, for viewing by a bona fide nature tour group organized by Hanns Ebensten Travel Inc., of New York. The individuals concerned had obtained reservations to Ebensten's "Ice-pack Tours", and went to the ice for 45 minutes on the first trip, on the morning of March 11; they broke away from the group leaders long enough to mark the two seals, and take a few photos. They immediately returned ashore, and left the Ebensten group without notice, taking off for the mainland on a Quebec Air flight departing at 13:55. They apparently made no mention to anyone of their actions until they were out of the country, at which point the claim seems to have been made in a news release put out by the Greenpeace Foundation, that 150 animals were marked. The five individuals included three Americans, and one each from England and France. They were not apprehended since their act was not known until the press release was issued only after they had left Canada.

2. The effects of marking these two seals (there was no dye-spraying as such) are nil.

The offshore, large vessel hunt at the Magdalen Islands had already been terminated by the date on which the seals were marked, so there could obviously be no direct effect on the sealers' catch, even if large numbers of animals had been marked. Moreover, seal pups at that time had reached the "tanner" stage, i.e. they had started shredding their white fur, and were already largely independent of their mothers. Consequently, the value of the pelts could not have been affected, nor would the mother-pup bond have been likely to be disturbed.

3. Effects of dye-marking seal pups would likely depend upon the age of the pup, the type and amount of dye used, ambient environmental conditions and possibly the age of the pup's mother.

Studies have shown that limited amounts of some dyes have little direct effect on the pup or on subsequent mother-pup interactions.

Copious amounts of dye, however, could change the reflectance and transmittance characteristics of the white lanugo, and affect the pup's thermoregulation. Furthermore, if the dye included a wetting agent, it would further reduce the insulative properties of the pelt, an effect which could be especially serious to a very young animal which had not yet built up a heavy blubber layer.

In addition it is possible that certain dyes may possess odours which could interfere with the mother's ability to identify her own pup. Any such interference with the mother-pup interactions would have serious consequences on nursing and the chance of survival of the pups since they grow at a rate of about 2.5 kg/day during nursing, and the nursing period on average lasts only about 9 days.

The type and quantity of dye, or the extent of spraying which would be required to mark a seal permanently to the point of destroying the market value of its pelt could therefore seriously compromise the chances of survival of the marked seals.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL FRUIT AND VEGETABLE STORAGE CONSTRUCTION FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 13 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Have any applications been received under the Federal Fruit and Vegetable Storage Construction Financial Assistance Program from the Province of Newfoundland? If so, (a) how many have been approved, and (b) in what amounts?

2. Were any applications received and turned down? If so, for what reasons?

Reply by the Minister of Agriculture:

1. Yes.

(a) None.

(b) N/A

2. Yes. Two applications were turned down because neither producer group could meet the financial requirements of the program to directly finance the minimum of one-third of the project cost.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Question No. 17 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

[Senator Marshall.]

Regarding Release E-26, Agriculture Canada, what is the breakdown, by province, of the $41.2 million in loans made under the Farm Improvement Loans Act in the first quarter of 1980?

Reply by the Minister of Agriculture:

Province	No. of loans	Amount
British Columbia	262	$ 3,744,514
Alberta	1,367	14,143,602
Saskatchewan	1,338	14,645,770
Manitoba	492	5,162,708

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

CORRECTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege to call attention to a very minor correction that is required in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of yesterday. Under "Inquiries," Notice No. 2 for Tuesday, July 15, it states:

That we will call the attention of the Senate—

I should just like to say that I do not aspire to the editorial "we" and certainly not to the royal "we". It should read:

That he will call the attention of the Senate—

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to report on two matters. The first is on our schedule for next week.

Honourable senators will remember that yesterday I said we might sit extra hours next week in the hope that Parliament could finish its business by July 17 or 18. I said I did not think that this was likely, but that I would let you know today.

The news is that a very serious effort is being made to reach that objective, and therefore I am respectfully asking honourable senators to sit next week on Monday and Tuesday evenings, Wednesday afternoon and perhaps Wednesday evening. I don't think it will be necessary to sit Wednesday completed, because that takes it out of the order book and puts it in the yard. That is where the people work, and that, of course, is slightly different—in fact, significantly different—from the content of the reply that I gave him.

Senator Marshall: I was not talking to Mr. Walsh and I cannot say for sure what the minister is asking. However, on another point, with respect to the shipbuilding industry, Mr. Walsh and one of his colleagues in Montreal indicated that they were promised by the government that there would be talks before any changes were made, to allow them to put their case before the government. Evidently those talks were postponed and in the interim the subsidy was reduced from 20 per cent to 9 per cent.

Further, another expert in the shipbuilding industry, the president of the Canada Steamship Lines, said that the arguments of government run counter to the fundamental axiom of business, and certainly of the financial structure, and that decisions on capital expenditure have to be taken five years in advance.

Is the minister now willing to admit that this government acted hastily and without fundamental business sense, and have it review the decision and reinstate the 20 per cent subsidy until it decides on a new program?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the statement that I made in this house stands. Once again this is where we find difficulty in dealing with some illusory answer or comment by someone else that one is unable to examine to find out what it means or what the information is based on.

I am not sure whether the talks that were supposed to have taken place were promised by the previous government or this government. If they were promised by the previous government, I can tell the honourable senator that we have indeed honoured all of the commitments that were made by the previous government insofar as they were reasonable and responsible. There were a few made just before February 18 that we do not believe should be continued, and some have fallen away because of that.

The honourable senator should really give me a little more precise background information as to which government the talks were to be held with before there was some phasing out, and whether or not there was any indication from either the previous government or this government with respect to all of those things. Unless the honourable senator is willing to do that, I do not think we shall have a very useful discussion. I can tell him quite frankly that I do not accept the preamble to those questions as being factual. They may represent an opinion expressed by someone and we may disagree with that opinion.

Senator Marshall: I will give the minister the benefit of the doubt, and I shall do a little more research by speaking to the president of Canada Steamship Lines, who is the son of a former distinguished Leader of the Government in the Senate.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

TOURISM IN THE TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS—SUGGESTED CANADA-BERMUDA CO-OPERATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate which concerns a reported statement that this country is prepared to co-operate with Bermuda with reference to developing and fostering the tourist industry in the Turks and Caicos Islands.

As this has, as the honourable minister in charge of the Wheat Board knows, been a matter of deep concern for me for the last decade, could the leader indicate what in fact are the measures in which Canada will be co-operating with Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands in what seems to me to be a splendid Commonwealth initiative, and whether in fact the government has further plans to assist this most important and highly cherished community in the Caribbean?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think all of us appreciate Senator Macquarrie's continuing interest in the Turks and Caicos Islands and his active interest in Commonwealth affairs. For that reason I wish I were in a position to provide a more helpful response to the question of whether the Government of Canada intends to enter into an agreement with the Government of Bermuda to co-operate in the development of the Turks and Caicos Islands. The Canadian government has received no proposals from the Bermudian government on the development of the Turks and Caicos Islands and has no proposals to present to the Bermudian government on the economic development of these islands.

The Canadian Commissioner to Bermuda, J. S. Nutt, is currently in Bermuda on a visit of a routine nature. This visit is not for the specific purpose of discussing Canadian development of the Turks and Caicos Islands.

It is understood that private individuals are interested in tourism development which might involve Canadians and Bermudians collaborating in the Turks and Caicos Islands. No consideration is being given in Canada to providing government funding for any projects.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAM

Hon. D. G. Steuart: I should like to direct a question to Senator Argue, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, having to do with a press release concerning the drought relief program announced approximately two weeks ago by the Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, and himself.

If I might, I should like to refer to an article in the Regina Leader Post of July 12, which quotes certain statements by Mr. Roger Baldwin, the program co-ordinator. Evidently there was either a press release put out or an interview of Mr.

Baldwin, but what concerns me is that the information contained here appears to be substantially different in certain respects from the program as it was announced by the two ministers. I think it would be good if that difference could be cleared up.

If I may, I will just read it from the article:

> The federal drought relief program should cost less than the $60 million allocated for it, program co-ordinator Roger Baldwin said Wednesday.
>
> "Whatever money is left over from the herd maintenance program is available for other drought programs," Baldwin said in an interview.

Referring to cattle producers, the article goes on to state:

> Many producers who apply for assistance will be dropped from the program because they will have to sell off cattle despite the federal plan, he said. This will leave extra money.

Further on, the article says:

> He also said there could be programs to assist grain farmers, although some possibilities—like a grain feed program—are no longer feasible.

Finally, there is one thing that does bother me because it seems to be contradictory of the information that was put out, and that is the following statement:

> Baldwin said the federal drought relief program was worked out in consultation with livestock producers and provincial agriculture officials.
> He dismissed any suggestion that provincial governments were not involved in the planning stage.

I wonder if the minister would be prepared to clear up some of those differences.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I thank the Honourable Senator Steuart for his question. I have received a number of complaints respecting this article. I have been in touch with Mr. Roger Baldwin who is being reported in this article, and he told me that the Leader Post reporter in question, Edward Greenspon, in fact interviewed him but, in general, the statements attributed to him were not in fact made.

● (2025)

In my experience, Leader Post reporters in Ottawa have been of quite a high calibre, and my experience with them has been excellent over the years. However, I am afraid that the articles which have appeared in the Leader Post with regard to this program, and the other program that preceded it, have been quite misleading, not very informative and, I think, far off the facts.

Senator Steuart referred to the following statement:

> The federal drought relief program should cost less than the $60 million allocated for it.

I certainly do not know that that is a fact. My own opinion is that it is likely to cost that much and, certainly, the federal government is prepared to spend that much money. I am not able to say whether that will be the exact figure, but the program is there and it will take all or most of the $60 million.

In the newspaper article, the following statement is attributed to Mr. Baldwin:

> Whatever money is left over from the herd maintenance program is available for other drought programs.

My first answer also applies to this statement. If there is nothing left over, then there is nothing for anything else. I think that statement is incorrect and should not have been put in print.

The article further states:

> Many producers who apply for assistance will be dropped from the program because they will have to sell off cattle despite the federal plan.

I do not believe that is accurate. If a livestock producer applies to be part of the plan, I think his intention will be to keep his cattle. There must be exceptions, but it is a disparaging remark to suggest that these people will have to sell off their cattle despite the plan and that because these people, in desperate circumstances, sell off their cattle, there will be extra money for the program.

Mr. Baldwin is also reported as saying:

> Depending on our perception of the duration of the drought and the impact the duration will have, the programs could extend to all sectors of agriculture.

That is a broad and sweeping statement, and I do not believe that a program which starts out to assist the livestock industry because of a drought is likely to extend to all sectors of agriculture.

Referring to Mr. Baldwin, the article further states:

> He also said there could be programs to assist grain farmers—

I know of no program to assist grain farmers.

> —although some possibilities—like a grain feed program—are no longer feasible.

Perhaps it should read "a green feed program." In any event, the whole article is very misleading, and does not make much common sense. That kind of article does not serve any useful purpose, quite apart from being misleading.

Senator Steuart referred to consultation with livestock producers and provinces generally. There were some earlier consultations with provincial officials. This program was developed after federal consultation with livestock producers themselves.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: This program came into existence because of recommendations from livestock producers. I have been in personal contact with many of these livestock producers, as has Senator Olson. We know them on a first-name basis. This is basically their program.

This program was based on a very sound premise, namely, that the livestock producer can use money put into his hands more efficiently to cover the difficulties he is faced with than provincial or federal governments in the administration of specific programs that lead them along many avenues.

Senator Smith: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The next time he arranges for one of his friends to ask a question, can he arrange to give a shorter answer?

● (2030)

Senator Argue: I know it troubles honourable senators sitting opposite that there should be some intelligent questions put forward in the chamber, and that frequently they come from this side of the house. I hope there will be further questions of the same calibre asked from the government benches.

Senator Smith: I hope the high quality of the questions referred to by the minister will in the future, though not today, be equalled by the quality of the answers.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I could direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I noted his great concern—and proper concern—for having the facts in relation to shipbuilding yards and the reduction in the subsidy. I know he will not have the information I seek with him tonight, but I wonder if he could furnish the Senate with a list of the shipyards in the Atlantic provinces in respect of which he had this information, and what that information may be.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I think I can, honourable senators. I have that information with me—at least, I did have it with me one day. There was an assessment done of the various shipyards, and when they would be coming to the end of the work that is now committed to them in the way of contracts, and so on. I will obtain that information. It is either somewhere in this book or up in my office.

AIRLINES

GREAT LAKES AIRLINES SERVICE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government about Great Lakes Airlines, which serves Sarnia, London, Toronto, Peterborough and Ottawa.

During each of the past two weeks I have gone to the Peterborough airport in the hope of catching a plane to Ottawa. On both occasions the plane did not come at all, apparently because of mechanical defects.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could inform me how many times during the past four months Great Lakes Airlines has failed to service the airport at Peterborough for reasons other than weather.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward to the Minister of Transport. Obviously, I do not have detailed information about these flights or even flights of fancy on my desk at this moment.

THE SENATE

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON NATURAL RESOURCES AND THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government.

On April 29 last, when I participated in the Throne Speech debate, I suggested that we set up a Senate committee on natural resources and the environment. The scope of such a committee would have been wider than that of the Northern Pipeline Committee which we have just reconstituted. I am wondering if any thought has been given to this matter, and if we can expect a decision in the near future.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if it is the desire of a majority of senators that there be an initiative of that kind, of course, democracy will rule, and that committee will come into existence.

Senator Flynn: For once, a free vote.

Senator Asselin: You are funny; you are a funny guy.

CANADA

ITALIAN ORIGIN OF EARLY EXPLORER

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Is the leader aware that the Toronto Star published on July 1 a Canada Day quiz consisting of 50 questions prepared by W. D. Conly Research Ltd.?

● (2035)

Question 15 was: Who was the first English navigator to land on Canadian shores? The answer given was: John Cabot, 1497.

Is the leader aware that Professor Samuel Eliot Morison in his recent work, The European Discovery of America: The Northern Voyages A.D. 500-1600 (New York, Oxford University Press, 1971), reveals that the navigator preferred to be known by his original name, Giovanni Caboto, a citizen of Venice? Furthermore, this contention was sustained by the Hakluyt Society in its work published in 1961, which supports that thesis. Does the leader agree that this is a gross inaccuracy, if not a downright distortion of a historical fact?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that no thinking Canadian would ever wish to abuse the memory of Giovanni Caboto, and I have no doubt that that was his preferred name. However, the other day I talked to a Canadian of Scandinavian descent. He claimed that the Vikings had landed at L'Anse-au-Meadow, Newfoundland, long before Giovanni Caboto had made his voyage to the new world. I talked to a Canadian of Welsh descent a few months ago and he said that there is a "lost tribe" of Welshmen living in North America whose ancestors were the true discoverers of America. The other day I talked to a Canadian of Irish descent who claimed that the Irish had arrived on these shores in leather boats long before the Vikings, the Welsh and the Italians. Perhaps it is a matter for the historians to determine who really touched our shores first. Certainly, no one disputes the fact that Giovanni Caboto was a magnificent navigator. His arrival on Canada's shores is a solid historical fact and not merely a legend or rumor, and it is also an historical fact that this great human being was a citizen of Venice.

Senator Bosa: Is the leader aware, though, that all those people that he mentioned, and who may have landed in Canada, did not have in their possession, as Caboto did, letters patent issued by King Henry VII, which is tantamount to having landed immigrant status?

Senator Perrault: Senator Olson, who is of Scandinavian descent, noted in a jocular aside just a moment ago that Leif Erikson may well have had letters patent from King Canute and Eric the Red. Certainly, Senator Bosa makes a strong case when he reminds us that Giovanni Caboto had letters patent from King Henry VII. Canadians, regardless of ethnic descent, are proud of all those who helped to discover and explore our great country. Giovanni Caboto made a magnificent contribution in this regard. Senator Bosa does all of us a service by reminding us of this great man and his origins.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NUCLEAR FUSION RESEARCH

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last Friday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the other place confirmed that while comments by the Minister of Science and Technology to the effect that Canada should withdraw from nuclear fusion research do not yet constitute government policy, our participation in this international endeavour is indeed under review.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Has the government compiled an estimation of the potential cost to Canada of buying nuclear fusion technology subsequent to its eventual development if Canada loses its right of access to that technology by not participating in fusion research? If so, would the leader table that information in the Senate at some future date?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Yuzyk: I have a supplementary. Has Canada received any representations from its current international partners in nuclear fusion research to the effect that our continued participation in research into this important energy source of the future is both welcome and desirable?

• (2040)

Senator Perrault: Information will be sought in that respect and added, if possible, to the reply to the first question.

Senator Yuzyk: We look forward to that.

ENERGY

EXODUS OF PETROLEUM EXPLORATION COMPANIES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Can the minister tell us what measures the government intends to take in response to the growing exodus of petroleum exploration companies to the United States?

So the minister will not quarrel with the preamble to the question, or the basis of the question, I may tell him that I put a question about this matter to the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who appeared before our National Finance Committee this afternoon, in the course of which I had occasion to quote a statement made by the President of the Canadian Association of Oil Well Drilling Companies expressing his concern about this matter and stating that Canadian companies were devoting an increasing part of their budgets to exploration in the United States instead of Canada. The deputy minister indicated he was familiar with the statement and believed it to be true.

So my policy question to the minister is in relation to the measures the government intends to take to stop this outflow of activity.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I am sure the honourable senator realizes that we are now deeply involved in negotiations on an energy program, especially in relation to gas and oil, and that the result of those negotiations, especially the pricing arrangements, is vital to seeking and announcing the solutions that would encourage developers to spend additional funds in Canada for the purpose of increasing reserves of both natural gas and crude oil, and indeed other hydrocarbons of various forms, including such things as heavy oil, tar sands, and so on. Exploration programs could be significantly enhanced once we have concluded the negotiations with the producing provinces respecting price.

The honourable senator will also realize that there is now a very significant supply of natural gas available. A great deal of it, of course, is in the reserves as determined by the formula that the National Energy Board uses. There is, I think, optimism in respect of the reserves that are known now but which are not strictly within the calculation of the reserves according to that formula—and I am not arguing with that formula; I am simply saying that there is a lot of optimism that there is indeed significantly more natural gas than what is included in the reserves as established by the National Energy Board.

I expect the answer in that respect is fairly straightforward, that being that there is a limit to the amount of investment that will be made in respect of this kind of activity until and unless there is an enhanced cash flow to pay for those investments. There are many ways by which to reimburse on the operating costs and on the capital invested, but it does seem to me that it would be better if we waited a short time for some decisions to be made with respect to that, and perhaps a little longer—but not much longer—with respect to decisions that are necessary before there is an enhanced economic prospect for further additions in this field.

Senator Murray: The minister confirms, then, that it is the delay in reaching political agreement as between the federal government and the producing provinces that is largely responsible for this exodus. Is the minister in a position to comment on the accuracy of the figure of $600 million that is being said to be the amount of investment that will be lost this year as a result of this exodus?

Senator Olson: That is obviously someone's estimate, probably that of one of the associations of exploration companies. I am not going to identify them, but there are associations of drilling companies, and so on.

I do not believe that an estimate should be taken as fact. Quite obviously, there are motivations as to where one looks for oil or gas, or whatever. It is dependent on such things as the seismic data available and the market potential for any find that may be made.

My honourable friend is aware that marketing potential is one difficulty. There are many companies that have several years' investments in gas production, for example, for which they have not had any cash flow, and it would certainly substantially enhance the position of those companies if they could begin to realize on their investments made two or three years ago.

I can advise honourable senators that there are now over 9,000 gas wells in Alberta that are capped and not producing because of lack of markets. On the other side of the coin, the production side, that compares with something in the neighbourhood of over 13,000 wells that are producing.

Without getting into the details as to how much gas that represents in one group or the other, there is probably a larger number of lower-producing wells in those that are capped than on the other side. I think that indicates something of the magnitude of the difficulty facing further investment in that area.

Senator Murray: One final supplementary. In view of the professed desire of the Canadian government to see more Canadian content in this industry, is the minister not concerned that the vast majority of companies involved in this exodus are small independent Canadian companies?

Senator Olson: I suppose if you were to say that the vast majority are small Canadian-owned companies. Of course, with the multinationals, I suppose they already have operations in the United States and in several other places, so there would not be a transfer out of Canada into those places. Rather, it would be an enhancement of both the capital and the personnel that would be used, wherever they are. There is nothing new about that. When there is what is called a "hot spot" in the oil business, whether it is in the North Sea or off Indonesia or some place in the United States, or even some place in Canada, the multinationals enhance their activities in that area, and I am not sure that it is an entirely unbeneficial or unproductive activity for some Canadian companies to now be able to begin multinational activity.

Senator Murray: Because they get a better return in the United States.

Senator Olson: They may, and then again they may pass up some possibility in Canada, too. As I mentioned in a speech I made in Jasper, those companies that make the decision to go some place else for their investment may find when they get back to Canada that the place where they could have probably made a better investment has been occupied.

SHIPPING

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE SERVICE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to Senator Marshall's question of June 19 regarding the formation of a Canadian Merchant Marine Service.

The Minister of Transport has advised me that shipowners are presently meeting with main shippers' groups to explain their position regarding the formation of a Canadian Merchant Marine Service. I am sure the honourable senator will agree that this kind of dialogue between these two industry groups on the issue is most worthwhile.

● (2050)

When the talks are over, Transport Canada will be willing to hold further discussions, possibly by the fall, on specific measures that could be conducive to a better climate for shipping under the Canadian flag.

Specific measures to be discussed could include tax incentives, financial incentives and greater access to available cargo.

In the meantime, Transport Canada officials are assessing the feasibility and cost of using Canadian vessels in selective trades such as Mexican oil or coal exports. Transport Canada's marine administration is acting in an advisory capacity with Petro-Canada to assess shipping options. Private shipping firms are also exploring selective participation in grain trade. Provided that viability of such participation is demonstrated, the federal government is willing to assist in encouraging Canadian participation in these areas.

I might add that at the last National Marine Conference in May, the Minister of Transport indicated sympathy for the position of Canadian shipowners competing in the difficult world shipping environment. He mentioned that selective support or selective participation might be a possibility.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NEW YORK STATE—DISCRIMINATORY LEGISLATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to Senator Nurgitz's question of July 10 regarding the recent passage of the "buy American"bill in the New York State Legislature giving preference to United States steel and steel related products.

Although New York Governor Carey had vetoed similar legislation in earlier years, he signed this year's bill after the legislature agreed to include a three-year sunset clause.

The Canadian government had made its views known to the New York State Legislature, Governor Carey and the United States administration in Washington, which has consistently opposed "buy American" legislation at the state level.

We are continuing discussions with the state administration in Albany to clarify the scope of the legislation, since the law does not define precisely what is a "steel product" or the amount of preference to be given to United States steel. We do know that exports of automobiles and parts covered by the Canada-U.S. Automotive Products Trade Arrangement are specifically exempted by the legislation.

I might add that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated in the other place a few days ago that he raised this issue with Governor Askew during his recent visit to Washington, and that urgent representation to the New York administration to have the application of that law defined as narrowly as possible to protect Canadian interests will continue to be made.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—MEETING OF PREMIERS OF ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked on June 14, by Senator Austin regarding the prebuild portion of the Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline. This is a matter which is generally within the area of responsibility of my colleague, the Honourable Senator Olson, but the question related to benefits from the prebuild which could accrue to the Province of British Columbia. It is for that reason that I have obtained information which may be of interest.

The reports of the British Columbia-Alberta joint cabinet meeting indicate that the prebuild was discussed. There was reference to the establishment of a committee that would discuss energy issues. Reports suggest that the energy committee will divide the United States gas market to make sure that British Columbia and Alberta work together instead of competing for the United States market.

However, honourable senators, it should be pointed out that the quantity of gas exported from the province of British Columbia has fallen from 676 million cubic meters in January 1980 to 276 million cubic meters in May of this year, with a corresponding decrease in revenues to the people of the province of British Columbia. There are many reasons for this, such as increasing gas supply in the United States, our passing on of the world price equivalent for gas, competition from other fuels, and so forth.

[Senator Olson.]

The total value of gas sales to the United States, from both Alberta and British Columbia, has fallen since the beginning of the year. Direct benefits to British Columbia for the prebuild are estimated at $70 million.

The prebuild, with a floor value of sales set at $1.1 billion per year, will inject a minimum of $100 million per month of gas sales in the United States market.

The body of information provided for me, honourable senators, indicates that as far as British Columbia natural gas exports are concerned, although British Columbia was licensed to export 687,000 cubic feet in June of this year, in fact, none was sold, at least to the time this NEB summary was prepared.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the government leader a supplementary question and request of him information as to whether the government is considering changing the export pricing formula for gas from British Columbia in association with the Province of British Columbia in order to allow British Columbia gas to be more competitive in the United States natural gas market.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure Senator Austin is aware of the new gas pricing formula agreed to between Secretary Duncan and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for Canada.

I am not sure of the exact date, but on May 1 or June 1 there was then a justification, if that is the right word, for applying the formula on the substitution of the BTU equivalent value of oil imported into Montreal. This would have indicated that the price should have moved from $4.47 per mcf, where it is now, to some higher amount—I believe $5.17. Indeed, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did not move it at that time.

I cannot speak for the minister or tell Senator Austin what the minister is going to do now. I do know that applying the formula on the substitution perhaps indicates that the price should go up more, because it certainly has increased as far as oil arriving in the eastern markets is concerned. However, I shall make representations to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am not sure whether the question carries with it an implication that it is a representation from the British Columbia government as well, but if it is, I will be happy to let the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources know that, too. I understand the recommendation is that there is a desire to lower the price from what it is now.

Senator Austin: As a supplementary question, and by way of explanation, I can say that we have had a rather rigid gas pricing formula into the United States market. As Senator Olson just explained, it relates to the BTU value of international oil. The result has been, in some of our markets, that the United States has competitive fuel sources at lower prices and, therefore, we are not able to be effectively competitive at the price we would like.

I would suggest that a policy be considered which would allow regional variation in the export price of gas, and which takes into account the particular United States regional market to which we are exporting. I thank Senator Olson for indicating that he is prepared to discuss that matter with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I should also like to ask him whether the government has received a report from the National Energy Board related to the economic viability of the prebuild?

Senator Olson: I will carry those representations forward and take the second part of the question as notice, because I am not sure of the propriety of giving an answer to it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question of my honourable friend? Will the same formula which now applies to the export of gas apply also to gas which will be exported through the prebuild section?

Senator Olson: I would expect that all gas exported at those ports would be sold at essentially the same price, yes.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-5, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

FORT NELSON INDIAN RESERVE MINERALS REVENUE SHARING BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-26, to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT BILL, 1980

THIRD READING

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the third reading of Bill C-40, to amend the Pension Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

She said: Honourable senators, in moving third reading of this bill I would like to speak briefly to some questions raised last evening by Senator Macdonald. He asked about the procedure to be followed by widows who will become eligible for payments under this legislation.

I discussed this matter today with Mr. Allan Solomon, Chairman of the Pension Commission, who pointed out that widows of disabled pensioners now deceased will, in fact, have to make a fresh application for such benefits as they wish to receive. On the death of a pensioner who is in receipt of a disability pension which will come into effect after the passage of this legislation, as a result of his coming within one of the new categories, his widow will automatically receive the increased amount. However, for those disability pensioners now deceased, the commission has found that many widows really did not want pensions and, in fact, refused them at various times in the past for their own personal reasons. Therefore, it appears to be much easier simply to make it known to them that they are now able to apply for pensions.

Mr. Solomon has advised me that there will be some publicity given to the passage of this legislation. Articles will be written in newspapers, and the commission will see to it that all this information gets into all veterans' magazines which appear to have an extremely large circulation. I think we have some 500,000 members of the Legion. In this way they hope to ensure that the passage of this legislation is given as wide a circulation as possible so that those widows who so wish will be aware that they are entitled to apply for benefits.

The other question raised by Senator Macdonald was about the backlog, and Mr. Solomon does admit that there is a considerable backlog that has grown over the past couple of years. Part of that has to do with the projected move of the commission, and the fact that some long-standing employees who decided not to make this move have already resigned and taken other positions. They are in the process right now of recruiting up to full complement.

He regrets very much that they do have a considerable number of cases, and included among them are some fresh applications from living pensioners who want to have their present disability pension reviewed. This, of course, has a great deal to do with the fact that many pensioners are growing older, which leads to further complications. The Pension Commission has made a considerable effort and has spent a great deal of time trying to determine ways of providing additional compensation to these pensioners.

Another fact that was given to me, however, was that in spite of the delays involved—which are very much regretted—about 54 per cent of the applications received for a review of disability pensions have eventually been approved.

So, the commission has tried very hard to accommodate those pensioners who have made application, and to find some way to give them an increased pension. I do not think there is any further information I can give Senator Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald: Did Mr. Solomon give the actual number of cases they have before them still to be heard?

Senator Neiman: As of now, apparently, there are some 4,100 cases before the Pension Commission. I agree that this is a considerable number. The chairman advised me that the normal number of cases for many years was between 2,700 and 2,800. It can be readily understood that once this legislation is passed that number may very well increase even more, so there is going to be considerable pressure on the commission within the next few years. I am quite confident, however, that they are doing everything they can to reduce that number as quickly as possible and they are, as I said, in the process of recruiting further staff to try to deal with the applications.

● (2110)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to comment on the procedure that will be used to notify those who will qualify for the widow's pension. The answer given by Mr. Solomon is not, to my mind, satisfactory, because past experience has shown that many thousands of veterans do not read the Legionnaire, and they do not know what is going on in the government. In the past I have suggested—and I believe it would be worthwhile to pass the suggestion on to Mr. Solomon—that only 1,500 persons will qualify in the first six months and there is no reason why a letter, written in layman's language, could not be sent to those people—the list is available—stating their rights under the amendments to the legislation. There are 500,000 legionnaires and 800,000 veterans, and there are many widows who qualify but who will not even know about it. Experience has shown that to be so. Perhaps the honourable senator could suggest to the Chairman of the Pension Commission that a simple letter would achieve the desired effect.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I have already discussed that suggestion with the chairman, but I shall be glad to do so again. The suggestion is worth adopting if it is at all feasible.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, Senator Neiman has explained, in a clear and concise manner, that there are 4,100 applications to be processed at the moment, and that figure will, of course, grow and create more difficulties. As has been pointed out by Senator Marshall, many veterans and widows of veterans will suffer the longer the delays go on.

Senator Neiman said that because of the transfer of the DVA offices, there are those who are leaving the commission. Is it the intention of the government to expand the number of members of that commission, perhaps for a year or two, to enable it to deal with the backlog of applications that have to be processed?

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I did not clarify that particular point with the chairman, but he did inform me that they were actively recruiting at the moment. Whether that was simply to fill the vacancies or to increase the membership of the commission, I do not know, but I agree with the honourable senator that it is very necessary. There again, it is a question of economics. If they can get approval for the extra staff, I am sure they will find the people to fill the vacancies. I repeat that I agree that it would be worthwhile for the commission to receive extra help in order to deal with the additional applications.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, may I ask how long a task is it to process those 4,100 applications which are in arrears? Would it not speed up the processing if sufficient funds were authorized for the commission to increase its membership?

Senator Neiman: That was the point we were just discussing, that it would be worthwhile to increase the membership of the commission to enable it to deal with the applications more efficiently. I have figures here which indicate that at the moment the average time required to process an application is eight to nine months. Senator Macdonald gave me some information which indicated that some cases take longer than that. The chairman told me that formerly it took about five-and-a-half months, on average, to process an application. He also told me he believes that with the recruiting program they have envisaged it will take them anywhere from 12 to 15 months to bring their complement to the point where they can reduce the amount of time taken to deal with applications. However, part of the problem is that the fresh applications are largely related to aging and disability, and are so complicated and require such study that, by their very nature, they take a great deal of time.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I interject to say that unless the number of people on the Pension Commission who can make decisions is increased none of those widows will have their applications heard for at least two years. The backlog results from the delay in the Pension Commission's giving its decision. For the life of me I cannot understand why, after they have heard all the facts, it should take them three months to reach a decision. The Pension Commission will have to smarten up. If they cannot do it, then more people who can make decisions should be appointed so that the backlog can be dealt with and the new applications processed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I am sure the chairman would be happy to hear that recommendation and to have the support of the Senate in respect to obtaining extra personnel to assist him. I agree that it is an inordinately long time, and that delays can cause hardship. I can only say that the problems are of a complicated medical nature, and simply getting the medical examinations and reports take up a great deal of time. However, I will pass on the honourable senator's views. I believe his suggestion has the support of all honourable senators in that we would like to see these applications processed as quickly as possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILLS TO AMEND—THIRD READINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third readings of Bill C-268, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint Hyacinthe-Bagot); Bill C-402, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sarnia-Lambton); Bill C-488, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Rimouski-Temiscouata); Bill C-529, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington); Bill-565, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East); Bill C-599, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Berthier Maskinongé-Lanaudière); Bill C-600, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Cochrane-Superior); Bill C-601, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Argenteuil-Papineau); Bill C-602, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Verdun-Saint Paul); Bill C-604, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montréal-Sainte Marie); Bill C-605, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montreal-Mercier); Bill C-606, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Richmond-Wolfe); Bill C-608, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Montmorency-Orléans); and Bill C-609, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (La Prairie).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bills read third time and passed, on division.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1980-81

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81.

He said: Honourable senators, the borrowing authority bill now before the house seeks borrowing authority of $12 billion for the 1980-81 fiscal year. This bill also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as in Canadian dollars.

As honourable senators will recall, last April 21 the Minister of Finance tabled a paper in the other house which provided a projection of the government's budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements for the fiscal year 1980-81. These requirements were forecast at $11.730 billion. This amount excludes requirements for foreign exchange transactions.

In addition to these forecast cash requirements there is the need for a substantial margin of borrowing authority to provide for contingencies such as foreign exchange transactions. There are major uncertainties arising from foreign exchange transactions since either a major weakening or a major strengthening of the exchange rate would have an impact on the borrowing requirement. If the Canadian dollar were to be strong then the government would have to raise more Canadian dollars to purchase foreign exchange. On the other hand, the Canadian dollar could be weak, and the government would then be faced with the need to borrow foreign currencies.

All unused borrowing authority obtained under the Borrowing Authority Act 1979-80 was cancelled on March 31, 1980. Consequently, so far in the current fiscal year, the government has been charging new money raised through the issue of securities to unused borrowing authority obtained in prior years and carried forward. At the beginning of the fiscal year 1980-81 this unused authority amounted to $2.876 billion. To July 1 this year the government had raised just under $2.8 billion net new cash through debt management operations. As a result the government is virtually out of borrowing authority.

These debt operations comprise the raising of $2.3 billion new cash through the issue of Treasury bills and $2.5 billion through the issue of marketable bonds. However, the usage of borrowing authority is calculated on a net basis. That is, net changes in the level of outstanding debt affect the amount of outstanding borrowing authority and net Canada Savings Bonds redemptions of around $1.7 billion have offset a portion of the borrowing authority used up by the issue of marketable bonds. The paying-off of drawings in the amount of $0.3 billion on the standby credits made in the previous fiscal year have had the same effect.

The $12 billion borrowing authority now being sought is required to cover the balance of the budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements in the current fiscal year and to provide a margin for contingencies. As mentioned earlier, cash requirements at the beginning of the fiscal year were $11.7 billion. So far this fiscal year, net debt operations have amounted to about $2.8 billion. Also, as mentioned above, there is the need to cover any contingency to borrow for foreign exchange transactions which can be very large and volatile. Furthermore, the government pays a standby fee on $5.5 billion of standby lines of credit which it could not draw on without borrowing authority.

As I mentioned earlier, the government is virtually without borrowing authority at present. As it is, the government is planning a bond issue to be announced and sold next week for delivery likely on August 1. In the interest of orderly debt management it is important to proceed with this issue. However, in order to do so, it is essential that new borrowing authority be obtained immediately. The government also needs the new authority to proceed with its treasury bill program and the planning of this year's Canada Savings Bond program. The government also needs the flexibility to develop its borrowing program in a way which takes greatest advantage of market opportunities.

In any event, all outstanding and unused borrowing authority provided by this new act for the fiscal year 1980-81 and in respect of which no action has been taken by the Governor in Council, pursuant to section 37 of the Financial Administration Act, will be cancelled on March 31, 1981.

Clause 2(2) of the bill is intended to clarify a point raised in connection with our foreign borrowings.

Over the years, as honourable senators will recall, the government has borrowed in many currencies including U.S. dollars, British pounds, Deutsche marks and lira and has always honoured its debts in the currency of the contract. This clause will serve to confirm the authority of the government to borrow and repay loans in currencies other than Canadian dollars.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, Bill C-30 requests the granting of permission for the government to borrow an additional $12 billion on the credit of the country. This amount of money is large indeed. I guess it is really only equal in its dimensions by the amount of information that is not available from government concerning what the money is to be used for. The bill itself is a masterpiece of conciseness. It occupies part of a printed sheet of paper about the size of a Hansard page.

I must congratulate the Honourable Senator Langlois for doing an admirable job in providing perhaps more information on the government's financial plans for the next months than we have been able to obtain for the past several months.

Senator Perrault: Open government!

Senator Doody: It is an open government with a closed mind and a very small dictionary.

Senator Perrault: Let's not get political here.

Senator Doody: The honourable gentleman has more experience in not being political than anybody on this side of the house. He has demonstrated that time and time again.

Honourable senators, we have, as I say, a sparse amount of information on this borrowing bill. Usually, when one is faced with a task of addressing oneself to a borrowing bill, one's first instinct, and a natural one, is to move to the budget document, pick it up, read it, examine what the financial, fiscal and economic policies are to be for the coming year, and then make some informed and reasonable comments—in a non-political sense, of course—as to the intent of the bill and the application of the funds.

• (2130)

In this particular instance I was thwarted in my ambition to read the budget document because, despite my requests of the ministers opposite, such a document was not forthcoming. Therefore, I feel obliged to ask a series of questions rather than to comment on the intention and purpose of the bill since, obviously, we do not know what the $12 billion is to be used for or, indeed, the balance of the $2.9 billion which the honourable senator mentioned in his introduction of the bill. How much of that $2.9 billion is still available to government has never been revealed. It may all be available, or perhaps some of it, but this is a sizeable amount of money which has not been accounted for, and it would appear that government has no intention of accounting for it at this particular time.

[Senator Langlois.]

The official document which one could expect to have at one's disposal has not been brought forward and, therefore, we have no budget. No plans for a budget in the near future have been announced, or, in the words of the Minister of Finance, "in the even further future."

In the absence of a budget, perhaps the honourable senators opposite might bring forward some information in reply to questions which I will pose. On prodding from his colleagues, perhaps the Minister of Finance would be more forthcoming and less reticent than he has been in the other place, and will answer some rudimentary questions.

What is the $12 billion to be used for? What is the breakdown of the $12 billion? If we take into account the $2.9 billion of the unused portion of the authorized borrowing of the government, the figure will be closer to $15 billion.

How much is going to be used for repayments, roll-overs and retirements of debt? My understanding is that retirements and roll-overs are outside of the borrowing authority, and that the government has the authority to service these ongoing budgetary measures. Therefore, I assume these amounts will be in addition to what we are asked to authorize here this evening.

How is the $12 billion to be raised? The honourable senator mentioned treasury bills and Canada Savings Bonds. Presumably there will be marketable bonds for some of the balance. There may be some other instruments. The breakdown is a matter of vital importance to this country at this time.

Earlier comments from responsible ministers opposite indicate that the Government of Canada has no intention of pursuing its Canada Savings Bond program in the coming year. It has given up on any attempt to compete with the private sector in interest rates to the public. Indeed, the minor miracle of our time has been that Canadians have not rushed forward to redeem the outstanding Canada Savings Bonds in their possession. They are to be thanked for their patriotism in this case. Are Canada Savings Bonds, then, to be a significant part of this borrowing or are we to depend more on treasury bills and long-term notes? Are they to be one-year notes, 30-day notes, or how is this program to be implemented?

Other vital questions should be answered. What is the real net debt of Canada today, including the pension fund borrowings which are mentioned from time to time? This was always a very convenient pool of Canadian funds for the federal and the provincial governments to dip into whenever the occasion demanded. No one calls anyone to account for it. These funds are paid into a pot, as it were, by the public servants, and governments help themselves from time to time, and nobody really knows what the liability is in that particular area.

There are contingent liabilities which are never listed as part of the public debt such as liabilities in terms of crown corporations. Whether they are legal liabilities or moral liabilities is immaterial. I would hesitate to dream of the Government of Canada allowing one of its crown corporations to default on a debt whether the obligation is a legal or moral one.

What part will the Bank of Canada play in the funding of this $12 billion? How much new money of the printed variety is going to be pumped into society. What part will it play in the $12 billion additional debt? The latest figures which I have in front of me, published by the Bank of Canada as of July 5, indicate that the public debt now is $74.489 billion and rising, and the forecast is that it will be close to $84 billion by the end of the fiscal year. Some of the more tenuous items I mentioned a moment or two ago are not included in those figures.

I think it is fair to ask: Where are we headed? What is the fiscal, economic and financial direction of the country? That can only be answered through a budget or some such statement of the government's intention. If we cannot get answers that way, I suppose we have to ask the questions on the second reading of a borrowing authority bill, and, in that respect, I do not have too much optimism about receiving answers. I feel that honourable senators opposite have an obligation to the people of Canada, through Parliament, to tell the public exactly where we stand in these areas.

The honourable senator mentioned foreign currencies. That sounds good. We think of exotic currencies such as the Swiss franc, the German mark and the Japanese yen, but what will be our outside exposure and the currency fluctuations in this matter? Will another $12 billion be borrowed in these foreign currencies, or what portion of it will be borrowed in this manner? How much are we going to be exposed to currency fluctuations vis-à-vis the Canadian dollar?

What of interest rates? Is there to be a ceiling on interest rates that we are willing to pay for this $12 billion, or is the sky the limit? Are we going to be in a position to pay whatever the marketplace demands in order to acquire this $12 billion, since I know how desperately we need it? The interest charges the government must pay, according to the latest figures available, is almost $11 billion. This represents 18 per cent of the total government pay-out for the present year. I am sure the figure is higher, but that is the latest figure available to me. As we approve these borrowing bills, we can expect to see these interest figures climb higher and higher.

However, I suppose we can safely continue to borrow and to service the debt as long as our servicing of that debt does not exceed 100 per cent of the amount of money we spend. That is obviously a silly thing to say because, if we spend 100 per cent of the money available to us on servicing the debt, then we have to exclude our payments to people, provinces, defence, foreign aid, police departments and all the other areas that governments are expected and elected to finance. We will not dedicate 100 per cent of our cash to servicing the debt. In this case we will only dedicate 20 per cent of it. Is that less silly or more silly than the 100 per cent craziness I just mentioned? What is the limit; has anyone given it any thought? These are questions that should be debated in a budget debate, but we do not have a budget debate.

Honourable senators, many other questions should be asked concerning the outstanding debt, U.S. funds, foreign currency and oil imports. How much is the oil compensation fund costing? How much was it last month and how much will it be next month, or will there be an oil compensation fund next month? How much of this $12 billion will be dedicated to looking after that oil compensation fund in the eastern part of the country? This has caused so many problems in the past and causes a great deal of uncertainty in the present and will in the future.

• (2140)

Honourable senators, there are a great many other pertinent things I could talk about, but I know it would be of no significance since this bill is going to be passed anyway. I wish, however, it could be passed after having been properly debated. The government will have its way, of course, but I cannot support the bill.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND SECOND READING

Hon. Louis de G. Giguère moved the second reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-5, which contains only one clause, aims at amending the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to increase from 1,357 million to 2,035 million the Special Drawing Rights which represent Canada's quota within the International Monetary Fund. This increase comes within the general increase of 50 per cent in the quotas of the International Monetary Fund which was agreed to in December 1978 by the Board of Governors of the fund. This general increase will ensure a better balance between the importance of available resources through the use of the credit mechanisms of the International Monetary Fund and the value of world trade.

The International Monetary Fund is the main institution of the international monetary system, and Canada considers it to be very important for the fund to have sufficient resources to continue its activities, especially at a time when the international economy is facing important balance of payments imbalances. The quotas are the main source of the funds that the International Monetary Fund lends to the countries which face balance of payments difficulties. This assistance enables the member countries to rectify their imbalances without implementing protectionist measures or taking other restrictive and disastrous action. Since Canada is considerably dependent on international trade, our country has every advantage in supporting the fund in its efforts to maintain a free exchange and payments system.

The quota also limits the loans granted to the members because of the various mechanisms of the fund. It determines the amount of each allocation of SDR's when they are issued, and finally, it determines the number of votes of the members and the make-up of the board of directors. The increase in our quota will allow us to maintain the level of our participation in the International Monetary Fund, to reflect the relative importance of Canada in world economy, and to guarantee our ability to take part in the activities of the fund as well as our right to elect a director. This increase will also bring about an increase in the resources which will be available to us in case of need as concerns the balance of payments, and will continue to assure us of the same share of future allocations of SDR's.

In Canadian dollars, our quota will increase from about $2 billion to $3 billion. The payment of this increase will be part of our exchange operations and will have very little effect on our requirements in Canadian dollars. In fact, the cash payment in Canadian dollars for this increase will represent one quarter of one per cent of the total amount, or about $2.5 million. Twenty-five per cent of the increase will be paid through SDR's held in the exchange fund. The difference, or about $748 million, will be paid in interest free demand notes. An increase of what is called our reserve with the International Monetary Fund will completely make up for the drop in the SDR's assets of the exchange fund. This reserve is the amount that we are entitled to withdraw from the International Monetary Fund for our balance of payments. It is included in our official international reserves.

If all the members of the fund accept the quota proposed for them, the total amount of subscriptions will increase from 38 billion to 56 billion SDR's. All honourable senators will agree that it is important to strengthen the financial situation of the International Monetary Fund so that Canada may continue to play an important role within this institution. Canada should therefore approve the increase of its quota proposed in this bill.

[English]

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, on a point of order; I wonder if we should not have a copy of this bill before we start debating it. I know it was received here only this evening, but the bill has been printed, and surely in the intervening time it was possible to distribute copies to all members of this chamber. I think that to debate the contents of a document which none of us has seen is really an exercise in futility.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have been informed that this bill has just been passed by the House of Commons. On the other hand, it has not been amended. The final version is exactly the same as that which was introduced on first reading and which honourable senators have had before them.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may take some small part in this debate, I would like to say that this is a bill which ought to commend itself to everyone in the chamber.

One of the most interesting developments in international affairs that came out of the Second World War is the whole complex of financial agreements which we describe as "Bretton Woods". Not all of those agreements have lasted unchanged since the time they were introduced. We know very well, for instance, that the agreements with respect to the fixed rate of exchange for currencies is one that has had to be modified over the course of time so that we now have a more or less managed float in respect of the value of money as between different countries; but some of the institutions of Bretton Woods that are still with us, and which I think are extremely valuable, are among those that are included in the scope of this bill.

One of these, of course, is the International Monetary Fund, to which direct reference is made and to the treasury of which we are being asked to contribute tonight. Others, of course, are the World Bank and the developmental bodies that have depended from it, such as the International Development Association and other institutions of that kind. I think we can say that this effort to provide an international facility to help the nations of the world with their financial problems has been a very desirable development indeed.

Tonight we are being asked to increase Canada's contribution to the International Development Fund by about 50 per cent, and it is rather interesting, at least to me, to find that by this bill we are allowed to raise a little bit of the curtain that surrounds the mysteries of international finance to find out how money is allocated for different purposes. Although at first glance it would appear that this bill requires a very large sum of money—I think $700 million—to be provided by the Canadian Government in the form of special drawing rights to provide backup or muscle for the International Development Fund, we are not actually being asked to lay out the cash. In fact, the arrangements seem to be highly sophisticated, if I understand them correctly, and certainly ingenious, because by far the larger portion of the money that is required will be simply an opening of an account in the books of the International Monetary Fund with a corresponding amount in the account of the Canadian foreign exchange managers by which Canada will be provided with extra drawing rights in case they run into financial difficulties, and yet, at the same time, the International Fund will use that right as the basis on which to expand its own activities.

Not only do we not put up any cash in this respect but very little consideration in respect of the small balance that remains, because, as the sponsor of the bill has told us, some of the money goes in as non-interest bearing notes and some goes in as special drawing rights that are provided for our use by the Canadian International Exchange Authorities.

It almost looks as if it is a sleight of hand, or a miracle, that takes place. The International Monetary Fund gets a very large increase in its capacity to do its job and, at the same time, it does not seem to cost us very much—at least it does not if all goes well. We have to recognize if all does not go well, there is a contingent liability here that we may have to face some day.

I hope that will not be the case but certainly it is a possibility that cannot be completely overlooked, because what is the money to be used for? Why does the International Monetary Fund need greater resources to do its work in the international field?

There are a number of reasons but one that I would put my finger on is OPEC. Because of the tremendous increase in the price of oil, the financial position of a great many countries—particularly Third World countries that have no oil supply of their own—has been affected disastrously over the last few years by the necessity to find enormous amounts of money to buy the oil they need to keep their economies going. There has not been any increase in their resources or, at least, any increase in their resources sufficient to match the expenses they have to meet. Consequently, they borrowed and borrowed from anybody who might lend them any money.

They borrowed from the commercial banks of this country. I would be interested to see what the amount is that the commercial banks of this country have at risk in the Third World countries that are under these great financial pressures, because when the commercial borrowers decide to pull back or decide that prudence indicates that they should not be quite so ready to meet the demands or requests made of them by Third World countries, then, of course, they appeal to the International Monetary Fund. That is wny the fund needs more resources to do the job of helping to maintain these countries that are in need.

I think that is an accurate analysis of the situation. I do not claim to have any qualifications at all as a banker, let alone an international banker, but my interpretation of the situation is that something similar to what I described is the situation that faces us now. The International Monetary Fund, of course, has a reputation for being a very prudent lender—some people might think it is an over-cautious lender—in that it accompanies its loans with certain rules about how the recipient countries should manage their affairs.

I recall not so long ago when the United Kingdom was in a position where they needed money from the International Monetary Fund or were threatened with the need—I am not quite clear which. The fund laid down certain rules even for that country to consider before the money would be made available. So you can imagine what they may be saying to countries like Jamaica and others, that are really on their beam-ends when it comes to international resources and foreign exchange partly—and I emphasize "partly"—on account of OPEC manoeuvres, and, if I may express a personal opinion, partly because of their own mismanagement.

However that may be, the International Monetary Fund has reformed a tremendous service. It has helped nations that need a little stiffening in financial management to proceed with rigorous measures that they might have felt reluctant to adopt if they did not have the pressure and advice of the International Monetary Fund to do so.

So if the fund was not there to make these monies available for these countries, their situation would be even more difficult than it is now. As it is, the fund gives them some breathing space; the fund gives them some opportunity to regroup and to reorganize their affairs in spite of the oil situation, and they can at least manage to carry on even though the burden of the cost of living of their citizens is indeed a formidable one.

Honourable senators, without wishing to prolong any discussion on this particular bill that is before us, I merely wish to say that, in my opinion, the International Monetary Fund fulfills a very real and important need today in that we probably have secondary benefits from it because it undoubtedly helps Canadian banks that have lent to some of these countries. I think that they need more money. I think it is right that we should give it. I would certainly support the passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Giguère moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SPRING MEETINGS AND EXTRAORDINARY PLENARY SESSION, LUXEMBOURG—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 26, 1980, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the Spring Meetings and the Extraordinary Plenary Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Luxembourg, from 5th to 8th June, 1980.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, allow me to give you in English a summary of my activities at the recently held meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly. It will take me less time this way.

[English]

Honourable senators, on June 26 Senator Royce Frith gave an account of his participation in the spring meetings and extraordinary plenary session of the North Atlantic Assembly held at Luxembourg from June 5 to June 8 of this year.

• (2200)

In the course of that account, he explained why he and the New Democratic Party delegate, Terry Sargeant, had abstained in the vote on the resolution on Afghanistan and related issues, which resolution condemned the Soviet invasion of that country and supported efforts for the withdrawal of Soviet forces and for a guarantee of the territorial integrity and self-determination of Afghanistan. While I had reservations about one of the five additional parts of this resolution—namely the one that implied NATO involvement in Southwest Asia and the Gulf area—after listening to the arguments of the United States delegation and other delegates, I voted for all parts of the resolution.

Since this resolution appears to be of a controversial nature, honourable senators might want to study it, and with that in mind I would ask for permission to have it appended to the Debates of the Senate of today's date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of resolution see Appendix "A", p. 659)

Senator Yuzyk: In view of the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan and the Soviet threats in Asia, the Middle East and Africa, I believe NATO must maintain solidarity and strengthen all of its military forces, while intensifying efforts to promote peace.

It will probably be of interest to honourable senators to learn that this was the first time in my seven years of participation in plenary sessions of the North Atlantic Assembly that a Canadian delegation did not vote en bloc. Our solidarity in foreign policy at North Atlantic Assembly meetings has won Canada some admiration and considerable support in the work of the committees.

The spring meetings of the Assembly reviewed the work of the following committees: Political; Military; Education; Cultural Affairs and Information; Economic; Scientific and Technical; the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People; the Subcommittee on Defence Co-operation; the Working Group on the Successor Generation, and the Working Group on the Preparation of the Madrid Review Conference. I was actively involved in three of these committees.

The Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, of which I am rapporteur for the third year, discussed the interim report, which was presented by me. That report dealt with the subcommittee's meeting in Rome on March 11 and 12 with officials of the Italian Ministry of External Affairs and Italian parliamentarians regarding preparations for the forthcoming Madrid Review Conference. The subcommittee also met in a private audience with Pope John Paul II, who expressed deep interest in the work of the group.

There was also a long interview with Monsignor Andreys Backis, Secretary of the Vatican Public Affairs Council—which is external affairs—who explained that the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the CSCE, has facilitated bilateral relations between the Vatican and the authorities in the Eastern bloc. The Vatican's policy of quiet diplomacy is the only channel open to the Holy See, but the Pope wishes to speak out clearly and strongly in order to inspire universal respect for religion and the other fundamental rights of man.

Members of the subcommittee praised the publication of the recent issues of The Bulletin, a quarterly journal, edited by the subcommittee, reporting on the implementation of the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. The Bulletin has been considerably improved and its circulation has steadily expanded, reaching governments and parliamentarians of the NATO allies, public and private organizations, universities, radio stations, and so forth. Many senators and MPs receive this journal. Government bodies and parliamentary organizations are urged to contribute relevant information to this valuable publication.

My report also included suggestions for a joint meeting with the United States Commission on Security and Co-operation in Europe, chaired by Dante B. Fascell, to discuss new proposals for the Madrid Conference. That suggestion was approved. The report presented a lengthy overview of recent developments, noting that violations of the Helsinki Final Act have increased in the last six months, particularly in the Soviet bloc countries. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the denial of diplomatic immunity to United States diplomats in Iran, the Olympic boycott by the United States and other countries, the sentencing of Charter 77 signatories in Prague, the virtual exile by the Kremlin of Andrei Sakharov and arrests of many members of the Helsinki monitoring groups in the U.S.S.R. have brought increased worldwide attention to human rights.

[Senator Yuzyk.]

Some small improvements have been noted—conditions in education and cultural exchanges between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A.; amnesty granted to many political prisoners in the German Democratic Republic; the reunion of divided families in several countries; and expanding tourist travel.

Attention was focused on the recent large volume entitled Fulfilling Our Promises: the U.S. and the Helsinki Final Act, published by the United States CSCE, in preparation for the Madrid Conference. That study is the first complete analysis and self-criticism ever done by a CSCE country of its record of compliance to the Helsinki Agreements. In addition to the commendable U.S. performance, the commission urges that improvements be made to ensure blacks, hispanics, American Indians, women and other minority groups equal rights, some being already acted on. Having a good record, I suggest that Canada should publish a similar report.

The full-day meeting of the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information heard and discussed reports of the general rapporteur and several subcommittees.

The draft general report, presented by Senator Klaas de Vries of the Netherlands, consisted of five sections. Under the heading "Human Rights and the CSCE Process," reference was made to the report of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, concluding that after the initial indignation of the NATO allies, it is preferable to continue the dialogue with the Soviet bloc and avoid jeopardizing the positive aspects of the CSCE process. The attitude of the United States regarding the following aims of the Madrid Review Conference is shared by its allies:

> —to foster real progress toward respect for human rights before, during and after the Conference;
>
> —to ensure that there is a frank and thorough examination of the implementation of all aspects of the Final Act, particularly those relating to human rights;
> —to promote security and economic co-operation; and
> —to maintain a proper balance between the different baskets of the Final Act.

Regarding the Moscow Olympic boycott, the rapporteur presented all arguments, pro and con. The Soviet handbook of November 1979, at page 58, attaches political significance to the Games, stating:

> —the fact that the capital of the first Communist country in the world is playing host to the Olympic Games provides convincing proof of the universal importance and vision of the foreign policy of the Soviet Union.

It is suggested that the Games be returned to their original homeland, Greece.

Section three, entitled "The New World Information Order," comments on the results of the 1979 World Administration Radio Conference in Geneva, which revised the world's radio regulations for the first time in 20 years. It will come into force on January 21, 1982. Several paragraphs dealt with the final report of the International Commission for the Study of Communication Problems.

The commission, formed in 1977 under UNESCO auspices, is also known as the McBride Commission, after its chairman, the Irish statesman, winner of the Nobel and Lenin Peace prizes. This controversial two-year study of global communications and freedom of information appeared as a compromised final report. Censorship is condemned, the individual's freedom to communicate is emphasized and free access to official and unofficial sources of information within all countries is promoted. Several important controversial issues requiring further study were:

—an international code of ethics;

—some form of international "right of reply and rectification" for individuals, groups or governments to reply to news stories; and —plans for the United Nations, possibly with UNESCO, to establish an international broadcasting arm.

Communication can be an instrument of power, a revolutionary weapon, a commercial product or a means of education; it can serve the ends either of liberation or oppression, either of the growth of individual personality or of drilling human beings into uniformity. It is suggested that Sean McBride be invited to the next annual session of the Assembly to discuss the conclusions and recommendations of this international study.

Section four of the report is entitled "Political Education and the Atlantic Dimension in the Education of Youth in Member Countries." Deep concern is expressed about the ignorance of youth in the area of international political problems and those of interest to the NATO alliance. The working group on the Successor Generation, chaired by Baroness Bacon of the United Kingdom, has begun studying this problem by examining various aspects of political education for the young in the school systems in several member countries. The Council of Europe and the Atlantic Council are making efforts to improve political education by adding an international dimension.

It is recommended that these countries strengthen support of the alliance in successor generations and to promote political education outside the schools. It is also suggested that a "Youth Assembly", bringing together members of the successor generation, be organized by the North Atlantic Assembly. The gathering of young people selected to represent each member country would be an excellent opportunity, not only to brief them on alliance affairs, but also to get valuable information on youth attitudes.

In section five, captioned "Evolution of Cultural Ties between Europe and North America (United States and Canada)," the rapporteur expresses concern about the deteriorating cultural relations between the European and North American allies. Preserving this relationship involves revitalizing our cultural as well as our political ties, including exchanges in education, arts, sciences and information, and thus changing our directions through creative borrowing and strengthening an awareness of shared values, which are the roots of the ideological defence of the alliance. It was in that spirit that the committee decided to set up an exhibition of the works of art from the 15 member countries of the alliance, in which Canada has agreed to participate.

An address was delivered by Professor F. Ermancora, Austrian representative to the United Nations Human Rights Commission and the European Commission on Human Rights. He stated that Basket Three of the Helsinki Final Act was a copy of the United Nations Declaration. The overwhelming condemnation of Soviet aggression in Afghanistan at the United Nations in January was regarded by the Soviet Union as interference in their internal affairs, just as was the issue of human rights at the Belgrade Conference. Professor Ermancora stated that the establishment of an international fact-finding commission to monitor signatories would be more effective, as fact-finding is not regarded as intervention. Governments of states must present violations, forming a system of human rights within the framework of the Helsinki Agreement.

In my capacity as rapporteur of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, I gave a report of the activities of this committee, which I reviewed earlier in my speech to this chamber. That was discussed and approved.

A meeting was held of the newly established Working Group on Preparation for the Madrid Conference consisting of seven members, chaired by Peter Corterier, of the Federal Republic of Germany, all appointed by Paul Thyness, of Norway, President of the North Atlantic Assembly. I was selected to represent North America. The purpose of this special committee is to study the developments of the preparatory stages of the Madrid Conference and to promote the co-operation of the NATO allies and the co-ordination of CSCE activities at the Review Conference in Madrid.

On June 2 and 3, this working group visited Washington, where it met with officials of nine U.S. government departments and bureaus, including the Department of Defence and the U.S. Commission on Security and Co-operation in Europe. Discussions centered around the Olympic boycott, the embargo on trade with the U.S.S.R., tensions within the alliance and co-operation of allies at the Madrid Conference. In general, the tone was one of guarded caution.

At Madrid, the United States will be taking a firm stand, short of confrontation with the U.S.S.R. insisting on a proper balance between the different baskets of the Helsinki Final Act, a thorough examination of each, particularly the implementation of human rights, and that, unlike what happened at the Belgrade conference, a statement on Basket Three must be included in the final document. Plans are being made for meetings of the working group with the governments of France and Spain.

The twenty-sixth annual meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly will be held in Brussels, Belgium, at the NATO headquarters, on November 16 to 22 next. Here, in the face of Soviet imperialistic adventures, supported by powerful military forces and superior armaments, Canada's role should help to maintain NATO solidarity and help strengthen the military forces and armaments of the allies.

The Madrid Review Conference will officially open on November 11, a week after the U.S. federal election. The United States will be sending a strong delegation, including the U.S. Commission on Security and Co-operation in Europe, composed of 12 members of both houses, with the right to speak and vote, as at Belgrade. Canada's delegation will be headed by Ambassador R. L. Rogers, former ambassador to Yugoslavia and Bulgaria and former High Commissioner to India.

At the request of the Canadian Helsinki Parliamentary Group, the Minister of External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, has agreed to include parliamentary observers in the delegation, as was done at the Belgrade Conference. Many other NATO countries will be sending parliamentarians to Madrid in keeping with the democratic practice, which is an embarrassment to the totalitarian countries of the Soviet bloc.

The House of Commons has recently set up a Subcommittee on the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe to prepare for the Madrid Conference. The subcommittee's task is to hear the views of the Canadian public and submit its report to Parliament before the opening of the Madrid Conference. This will be a good opportunity for Canadians to join in the work of their parliament and government by submitting briefs and appearing at the hearings.

Honourable senators, I am convinced that Canada is playing a positive and useful role in world affairs, promoting freedom, democracy, progress and justice through human rights and peace. Endowed with rich natural resources, a great nation composed of peoples from Europe and other parts of the world working in harmony, and a protected geographical position, let us assume greater responsibilities in the NATO Alliance.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-FIRST MEETING

Hon. Harland de M. Molson rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, July 9, 1980:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-first Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at San Diego, California, U.S.A., from 23rd to 27th May, 1980.

[Senator Yuzyk.]

He said: Honourable senators, The 21st meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group was held in San Diego, California, from May 23 to 26. The American delegation was chaired jointly by Senator Edward Zorinsky of Nebraska and Congressman Dante Fascell of Florida and the Canadian delegation was chaired jointly by Herb Breau, Member of Parliament, and myself.

From the detailed report of the meeting which I am tabling today, with the consent of honourable senators, it will be seen that for the discussions, the delegations are divided into three committees:

> Committee 1: Co-chaired by Senator Zorinsky and myself dealt with economic and defense issues.
>
> Committee 2: On energy issues was co-chaired by Congressman Hanley and Frank Oberle, M.P.
> Committee 3: On fishery boundaries and environmental issues was co-chaired by Congressman Boland and Herb Breau, M.P.

Also, in plenary, a discussion of the current internal political developments in the two countries took place, serving to bring each delegation up-to-date on the domestic scene in the other country. The Canadians recounted the constitutional situation in the wake of the Quebec referendum, and the Americans described the prospects for the coming election in the U.S. The American delegation also exposed us to a mind-stretching experience when we heard a noted U.S. futurist describe where he thought our society was heading in the coming decades. There is no doubt in my mind that this group provided Canada with its most important inter-legislative contact by far.

Currently, relations between the two countries are clouded by a number of issues, some of them of major concern, some of which are aptly termed irritant. In view of the very significant power lodged in the U.S. Congress, a power which acts independently of the U.S. Executive, the opportunity provided by these annual meetings is a unique one for Canada. Senior Canadian officials frequently claimed that, while they can explain a certain Canadian concern or viewpoint to their counterparts at the official level in Washington, they feel helpless without a chance to persuade the congressmen who will have a direct impact in committee on the issue. The biggest problem for Canada, it seems to me—and I told them so—is that the American legislators tend traditionally to support their colleagues on local issues in return for reciprocal support when a local issue of their own comes up. In the shuffle, the national interests, which surely can be defined as including good relations with Canada, often get lost. For the few days we are together each year, we do have a chance to sit down with a group from Congress and tried this year to make the best possible use of it.

Perhaps the example which comes first to mind is the exchange which took place in Committee 3 on the issues of the East Coast Fisheries and Boundaries Treaties. Honorable senators know how important an issue Canada considers this. Canada was fortunate in having knowledgeable spokesmen on this committee, including a former Minister of Fisheries who forcefully expressed Canadian concern over the seriousness of delaying ratification. According to accounts I heard later of this discussion—I was in another Committee at the time—the objections raised by the American side were responded to firmly and confidently. During the discussion it was suggested by the Canadian delegation that a special meeting of legislators should take place to allow Canadian delegates to speak further to other members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee about the fisheries treaty. This was agreed to and a group of parliamentarians, made up of members of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary group, is going to Washington this coming Wednesday, July 23, to urge ratification of the treaty as being in the interest of both countries.

Another topic which generated an intensive debate in committee was the Alaska Gas Pipeline. In particular, the American side questioned the assurances that Canada was now demanding before going ahead with the so-called prebuild section. One U.S. senator was obviously very much involved in the project. He told the Canadians that he, with another U.S. senator, had been trying to get the sort of assurances Canada was pressing for concerning a formal U.S. commitment to build the entire line as well as clarification of the financeability of the project; nevertheless, he urged Canada to proceed with the prebuild without further delay. The Canadian delegation made it plain that Canadians were apprehensive that if the United States found new sources of gas, the Americans might abandon the Alaska Gas Pipeline, leaving Canada with its portion of the line. Concern was also expressed that Canada was committing its own gas for export when many Canadians thought it should be coming into expanded eastern markets. I am informed there was also a good discussion of nuclear issues in this committee.

In my own committee, Committee I, Canadian delegates made clear to the Americans, Canadian perspectives on a number of import trade issues, including the deficit under the auto pact, U.S. procurement practices, and the impact on Canada of the American approach to deep seabed mining. One other issue which, like the fisheries issue, has led to follow-up contact was Agricultural trade. In view of the parallel importance of the U.S. and Canada in the world grain market, legislators are interested in trying to stabilize the market, possibly by agreeing initially on a North American floor price or by co-ordinating market shares between the two countries. The two delegations agreed that a further meeting on this subject between interested congressmen and senators and Canadian parliamentarians would be useful. In fact, a meeting will be held in Ottawa on Saturday, July 26, and members of the Canadian Senate from the principal grain growing areas will be attending this meeting. I understand there is a keen interest on the United States side in this subject, and a sizeable delegation is expected.

I have mentioned just a few of the highlights of our meetings. I am sure honourable senators would find it interesting to read in more detail the summary of the discussions. Our delegates prepared themselves well by attending a series of carefully planned briefing meetings beforehand, and they worked hard at the meetings. It will come as no surprise when I say all the arrangements for our stay in San Diego were beautifully looked after by our American hosts and we are most grateful for all their efforts on our behalf.

• (2230)

In winding up my remarks, I should like to add a couple of comments, mostly for emphasis. It appears to me that these annual meetings with our American congressional counterparts are showing more effective discussions on the points at issue between our two countries. Not only is the range of subjects wide, but I have the feeling that they are discussed in greater depth as time goes on and, hopefully, should lead to a better understanding of them. In this case the decision to have subcommittees continue the discussions on agriculture and on the fisheries and boundaries treaties is an indication of the desire on both sides to find solutions to our differences.

Finally, I again want to emphasize the fine handling of all administrative arrangements by the group from the Parliamentary Relations Secretariat, and for the constructive and effective help in the briefing arrangements and the conduct of the discussions by the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Relations and Trade. Those able people are making it possible for our delegations to perform very credibly in the meetings.

Honourable senators, I ask that the report of the Canadian delegation to the Twenty-first meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group be appended to the Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 660)

Senator Thompson: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question? I apologize for not being in the chamber at the commencement of his remarks, but I was attending a committee meeting. The honourable senator said there was a follow-up in connection with having two subcommittees. I understand that one of the topics discussed—I appreciate the fact that the honourable senator was probably not on the particular committee—was acid rain and its effects. Has there been any follow-up with a subcommittee contemplated to study that subject?

Senator Molson: No, honourable senators. As I mentioned, it is sufficiently innovative to have follow-up by means of subcommittees of the group. Having two is, I believe, an all-time first and an all-time high. I do not think it is a question of which subjects are important and which are not. If honourable senators take time to look at the report, they will see the scope of the subjects discussed. Most of them are quite important. Acid rain was considered to be very important. However, we have the hardy perennials such as Bill C-58, the border broadcasting stations, which have been linked with that American tax on convention expenses. We also have the Garrison Dam. If honourable senators will glance at the report, they will see that there are a number of such subjects, and obviously it would not be possible to set up subcommittees to deal with each of them.

In my remarks I was trying to indicate that we are actually making some progress, although modest, in that we now have the meeting in Washington on July 23 on a subject of vital importance to all of us in Canada, namely, the fisheries and boundaries treaties with the United States. Again, here in Ottawa on the following Saturday a group—I am told it comprises about 17 congressmen and eight senators—will be discussing grain marketing. Both of those are great pluses for us, because I know that all of us in this chamber feel that while we have problems in all directions, there is nothing as great as the question of our relations with the United States.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator has indicated a desire to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

RESOLUTION 96

ON AFGHANISTAN AND RELATED ISSUES

The Assembly,

Condemning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan as a violation of Afghanistan's sovereignty and territorial integrity, and of the right of the Afghan people to self-determination;

Recognising that events outside the geographic area of the Alliance which seriously undermine the individual and collective interests of member states ought to be a matter of intensive consultation with a view to developing common positions;

Considering the Soviet invasion to be a qualitative new step of Soviet expansionism threatening nations beyond the borders of the Soviet dominated alliance system, especially non-aligned countries in Europe and in the Third World;

Concerned that as a consequence of the invasion, East-West relations have deteriorated and that the East-West dialogue in general and arms-control negotiations in particular have experienced serious setbacks;

Recognising that the massive and continued deployment of SS-20 missiles is creating a highly unbalanced situation in Europe itself;

Affirming Allied determination to meet the Soviet challenge;

Convinced that Western cohesion is a necessary requirement for the maintenance of Western military, political and economic security and for the conduct of successful East-West negotiations and serves as an incentive for the Soviet Union to adopt more co-operative policies;

Concerned with the situation in the Middle East, the stability of which is essential;

Emphasizing the necessity for close consultations in the formation of a comprehensive strategy to meet the crisis confronting the member states in Afghanistan, where massive Soviet forces continue to occupy a formerly independent country;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to continue to press for the total and immediate withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan and to support efforts aimed at a political solution that provides for the withdrawal of these forces and for a guarantee of the territorial integrity and self-determination of Afghanistan;

2. to intensify their efforts to promote peace and stability in South-West Asia and the Gulf area;

3. to meet more effectively the requirements of NATO's Long Term Defence Programme and the renewed commitment to increases in defence expenditure and to immediate measures to strengthen European security and defence, as agreed to by the NATO Defence and Foreign Ministers at their meeting on 14 May 1980;

4. to reconsider the conventional military options and the possible tasks of the rapid deployment forces of certain member countries and, in light of these, to conduct immediately an intensive study as to how member governments, in line with their respective capabilities, can meet the military manpower requirements necessary to redress the balance between NATO and the Warsaw Pact;

5. to pursue arms control negotiations and the opening of negotiations on long- and medium-range nuclear weapons systems in Europe as soon as circumstances permit;

6. to assure, on the basis of the Ottawa declaration of 1974, close and effective consultations within the Alliance with a view to developing a common comprehensive strategy to meet the present challenges and to seek a more effective and lasting system of crisis management within the Alliance.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-FIRST MEETING, SAN DIEGO, CALIFORNIA
MAY 23-27, 1980

REPORT OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

At the 1980 annual meeting held in San Diego, California, the delegates from the two countries included Senators, Members of Parliament and Members of the House of Representatives. The delegates were divided into three committees for discussion purposes:

Committee I — Economic and defence issues
Committee II — Energy issues
Committee III — Fisheries boundaries and environmental issues

In addition, two plenary sessions were held, one to discuss multilateral issues and a second to bring delegates up to date on the principal political developments in the other country. The Group also heard a noted futurist give an assessment of the evolution of economic and political developments in the 1980s.

The purpose of these annual meetings is to exchange information and views and promote better understanding among Canadian and United States parliamentarians with regard to mutual problems and common interests. In order to encourage a frank interchange, it has been the practice since the organization was established to refrain from trying to reach common agreed positions.

The composition of the delegations was as follows:

The United States Delegation:

The Senate: Hon. Edward Zorinsky (Dem., Nebraska), Co-Chairman;
Hon. Max Baucus (Dem., Montana);
Hon. Ted Stevens (Rep., Alaska);
Hon. James A. McClure (Rep., Idaho).

The House of Representatives:
Hon. Dante B. Fascell (Dem., Florida), Co-Chairman;
Hon. Harold T. Johnson (Dem., California);
Hon. Sam Gibbons (Dem., Florida);
Hon. James M. Hanley (Dem., New York);
Hon. Edward P. Boland (Dem., Massachusetts);
Hon. Jim Lloyd (Dem., California);
Hon. Larry Winn, Jr. (Rep., Kansas);
Hon. Arlan Stangeland (Rep., Minnesota).

Ex Officio Members:
Hon. Lionel Van Deerlin (Dem., California);
Hon. Bob Wilson (Rep., California);
Hon. Clair W. Burgener (Rep., California).

The Canadian Delegation:

The Senate: Hon. Hartland de M. Molson (Ind., Quebec), Co-Chairman;
Hon. Alister Grosart (P.C., Ontario);
Hon. Paul C. Lafond (Lib., Quebec);
Hon. Daniel A. Lang (Lib., Ontario);
Hon. Charles McElman (Lib., New Brunswick);
Hon. George van Roggen (Lib., British Columbia);
Hon. David Walker, P.C., (P.C., Ontario).

The House of Commons:
Mr. Herb Breau (Lib., New Brunswick), Co-Chairman;
Miss Coline Campbell (Lib., Nova Scotia);
Mr. Jim Fulton (NDP, British Columbia);
Mr. Serge Joyal (Lib., Quebec);
Mr. Tom Lefebvre (Lib., Quebec);
Mr. James McGrath, P.C. (P.C., Newfoundland);
Mr. Donald Munro (P.C., British Columbia);
Mr. Jack Murta (P.C., Manitoba);
Mr. Frank Oberle (P.C., British Columbia);
Mr. Keith Penner (Lib., Ontario);
Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Lib., Quebec);
Mr. Robert Rae (NDP, Ontario);
Mr. Geoff Scott (P.C., Ontario);
Mr. Peter Stollery (Lib., Ontario);
Mr. John Thomson (P.C., Alberta);
Mr. Ian Watson (Lib., Quebec);
Mr. David Weatherhead (Lib., Ontario).

COMMITTEE I—ECONOMIC AND DEFENCE ISSUES

AGENDA

1. Economic Relations: economic conditions in Canada and the U.S.; prospects for closer economic relations in North America; auto pact.
2. Trade Issues: agricultural trade; TV broadcasting; U.S. convention tax; Government procurement practices; civil aviation relations.
3. Investment Issues: asbestos nationalization; anti-trust agreement; deep seabed mining; extraterritoriality.
4. Defence Issues: Norad renewal; joint air defence study.
5. Draft treaty on third party settlement of disputes.

Economic Conditions in Canada and the United States

The United States side introduced discussion with a brief resumé of facts as they existed at the time—consumer prices growing at an annual rate of over sixteen per cent, unemployment of over six per cent and anticipated negative real GNP growth for the year, factors which confirmed that the United States economy has begun a sharp recession.

A Canadian speaker followed with a brief account of the economic situation in Canada, which was being severely affected by the downturn in the housing and auto markets of the United States. Canada continued to have a severe balance of payments deficit amounting to $8.6 billion in 1979. Interest rates had been driven up to unprecedented levels and unemployment was higher than in the United States. Inflation was a serious problem because the country had not yet absorbed the necessary oil price increases. And the federal government was running a very large deficit owing to the prevailing system for equalizing oil prices in Canada. The country faced two serious economic problems: how to combat inflation when rates of interest were already high and how far to try to go through federal government action to equalize regional incomes and compensate for economic disparities?

Discussion focussed on this last question. The United States has just decided to introduce a windfall profits tax since "severance taxes" on resource production are inflating the incomes of some oil producing states. A U.S. Senator noted that the Senate had voted to exempt state royalties from severance taxes, since this was the only way some states could benefit from minerals or coal mined in their territory and then taken elsewhere for further processing. Even with these limitations, the windfall profits tax is expected to generate one-half trillion dollars of additional federal income at current prices in a ten year period.

This prompted a Canadian participation to question why the U.S. Congress passed the windfall profit tax, whereas the Canadian taxpayer balked at an 18 cent excise tax on gasoline. A U.S. speaker observed that the presentation was very different: the excise tax was visibly added to the pump price; the windfall profits tax was not visible and could be defended as a matter of equity for the taxpayer.

Closer Economic Integration

A United States speaker introduced this item, describing the range of recently-advanced proposals for closer economic links in North America, some limited to Canada and the United States, others involving Mexico as well. He noted that section 1104 of the Trade Agreements Act of 1979 calls for a report on these prospects by July 1981.

A Canadian wondered whether economic relations could become much closer, with non-dutiable trade already moving from 70 to 80 per cent of total trade, and both countries investing heavily in the other's territory. Nevertheless, a couple of prestigious economic research organizations in Canada had recently made a case for closer bilateral economic integration.

A United States Senator who had authored section 1104 explained that he felt it was important to conduct a sensitive examination of the potential benefits of closer links, since this approach had been beneficial in other regions of the world. He thought these were prospects for a special agreement on petrochemical trade and considered it would be useful to organize meetings among businessmen in the two countries to discuss the situation. These remarks led a couple of Canadian participants to point out that many Canadians including many manufacturers were uneasy about the approach and continued to be concerned about free trade.

Auto Pact

The discussion of this mutual problem was led off by a Canadian speaker who reviewed the usual complaints—a growing Canadian deficit composed entirely of parts imbalance and competitive bidding for new plants between the two countries. These well-known problems had been exacerbated by the sharp decline in the domestic car market in both countries and the financial problem faced by Chrysler which had let to a joint bail out.

An American participant from California expressed concern that the auto companies had been offered further relief from miles per gallon standards earlier mandated by the Congress. This action protected the North American industry from the need to adjust to meet standards which foreign auto makers already meet. The result in his state was that foreign manufacturers had last year gained fifty per cent of the market and this had grown to sixty per cent this year. Another American speaker noted that there were bills in Congress to place quotas on car imports which would probably gain a majority if they reached a vote, but this would not happen. The United States was faced with a choice: to import more oil or more cars. With the bill for oil imports now running at $95 billion annually, the United States needs fuel efficient foreign cars to cut back oil consumption.

The distress of the auto industry had created difficult domestic conditions for forcing change on the auto industry, change which all speakers agreed was necessary. One United States speaker expressed concern that in spite of the disastrous state of the industry, work practices were inefficient and the latest wage settlement did not reflect conditions in the industry. Concern was also expressed that General Motors might be left as the only North American car manufacturer.

A United States speaker expressed the opinion that the Surface Transportation Assistance Act had violated the auto pact and that, if that agreement were being reviewed, the question of exemption from the Surface Transportation Assistance Act should be explored.

Agricultural Trade

Discussion under this item focussed on two separate items: grain sales to the USSR and the prospect for an international grains agreement.

Spokesmen for both sides showed interest in the possibility of some kind of North American floor price agreement or a coordination of market shares between the two countries. A Canadian participant, noting that in Canada the objective of a floor price could be achieved through the Wheat Board's initial price, wondered whether the United States could use its intervention price for this purpose and asked how such an approach would be regarded by the private grain trade. A United States speaker thought U.S. farmers would raise objections and he considered it improbable that the Administration would look favourably on a floor price. It was decided that this question might be explored further at a meeting during the summer between interested representatives of the two legislatures.

While U.S. spokesmen were agreed that there was no prospect of removing the grains embargo vis-à-vis the USSR before the election, there was also scepticism that the embargo was seriously hurting the USSR. It was reported that the Argentinians were buying back grain from other customers for resale at higher prices to the USSR. There were suggestions that some grain was being trans-shipped to Russia from third countries. A Canadian spokesman pointed out that continuation of restraint on sales was beginning to hurt Canada. During the last crop year which ends this June other major wheat producers will have enjoyed record grain sales to the USSR, in spite of the restrictions in place since January 14. Only Canada's sales will be lower than the past maximum, owing largely to transportation bottlenecks in recent years. However, these have been overcome and shipping opened early on the St. Lawrence, so that Canada could export larger quantities during the next year. Continuation of the embargo into the next crop year will mean that Canada's new export potential is not utilized.

An alternative way of penalizing the USSR by charging higher prices for grain to that market was suggested. In response it was noted that it was simply not practicable to charge more in one market than in others.

Border Broadcasting and U.S. Convention Tax Law

The two items, as in previous years, were discussed together since the U.S. Congress has chosen to link them. However, for the first time in several years there were new elements in the discussion.

A Canadian spokesman introduced the subject, reviewing briefly recent developments. He noted the report due from the United States Trade Representative due on July 26 on a complaint that section 19.1 of the Canadian Income Tax Act is causing damage to the United States and referred to bills before the Congress to exempt Canada and Mexico from the provisions of the convention tax legislation. He drew attention, particularly relevant since the meeting was being held in San Diego, to actions being taken by U.S. stations in south-west California against station XTRA in Tijuana, Mexico, which broadcasts to the U.S. market and which these stations claim is engaged in piracy since it is gaining access to a market for which it is not licenced and for which it does not pay. Given the growing concern of producers in North America at their inability to control use of their productions by cable companies, he felt the border broadcasting problem should be resolved by the industry in the two countries as part of the larger problems they were now facing.

A U.S. representative from San Diego noted that XTRA differed from the border broadcasting stations in a major respect, in that it broadcasts in English and had no local market in Mexico. But he agreed that the Canadian Association of Broadcasters and the National Association of Broadcasters should jointly seek to resolve the problem.

He proceeded at this stage to ask for Canadian support in his endeavour to reduce the broadcasting band width from 10 to 9 kilohertz, thereby permitting the licencing of a substantial number of new stations. The United States faced a problem in that minority groups were late entries into the market, and were substantially under-represented; only 5 out of 760 TV licences and 125 out of over 6,000 radio licences were held by minority groups. The Canadian authorities were resisting this proposal on the grounds that it caused some technical problems. The U.S. speaker indicated that, if Canada accepted his approach, he would use his position as chairman of the competent subcommittee to resist the objections of U.S. authorities to a larger opportunity for Canadian cable companies in the United States market and also lend his support to exempting Canada from the application of the convention tax legislation.

On this latter point, the Canadian speaker noted that the linkage which was tacitly involved in the double taxation convention was in Canada's view more legitimate; withholding tax and convention tax treatment were tax measures with fiscal objectives. He hoped that the U.S. Senate would not hold up the treaty when it was presented for ratification on account of the objections of a special interest group. A U.S. Senator thought it important that the message be widely spread that the agreement was in the U.S. national interest. This prompted a Canadian participant to wonder whether the concession offered on withholding tax might be too high a price to pay at a time when the federal deficit was so large.

Procurement

This item was introduced by a Canadian spokesman, who summarized the principal complaints. These include the several forms of Buy American restrictions, the set-asides practice under which a portion of contracts are open only to specified classes of U.S. bidders (eg., small businesses, minority-owned businesses, businesses in areas of high unemployment), and the specific preferences shown by several U.S. government agencies, in particular the Department of Defence. The definition of a small business is established by regulation and varies by industry sector, but may be extended to cover the vast majority of U.S. businesses. As against these negative developments, the MTN agreement will somewhat enlarge as of January 1, 1981, the scope for foreign producers.

Since the subject was not one with which U.S. participants in the committee were familiar, there was no U.S. response.

Canada-United States Air Relations

In the course of a brief exchange on this item, a Canadian participant explained why Canada was not following the same approach as the United States in de-regulating the air transportation industry. Canada was a large, thinly-populated country, which meant that service to some parts of the country had to be subsidized by passengers using more travelled routes. Partly for this reason, Canada had a nationally-owned airline.

A U.S. speaker responded, reporting that the debate on de-regulation continued. Some who had opposed de-regulation were now less alarmed, while some supporters were less convinced of its benefits than they had been. He noted that airlines which wished to terminate services where there was no alternative service were required to assure a minimum of service for a decade to protect passengers in these areas.

Deep Seabed Mining

Discussion on this item generated lively debate.

A Canadian spokesman began by expressing concern over differences which had emerged between the two delegations in the Law of the Sea negotiations over the manner in which the products of deep seabed mining would compete in the market. Canada, with large domestic nickel production, favoured looking to deep seabed mining to make up the difference between current land-based production and future needs. Recently the United States had switched its position and appeared to be supporting the allocation of a fixed share of the market to deep seabed mining. U.S. participants contested this interpretation, claiming that their concern was to ensure that undersea producers had a fair opportunity to compete. Discussion on this point was not resolved, since each side had a different set of facts. The Canadians offered to follow up the discussion in writing.

Another theme which was hotly discussed revolved around differing views as to whom resources lying on the ocean floor beyond the 200 mile limit belong. Canadian speakers argued strongly that this was the last international resource, the "common heritage of mankind", any benefits from which should be shared equally among all peoples of the world. U.S. participants contested the basic principle and contended that if the international community could not reach agreement on an equitable approach, the United States and other developed countries should be free to develop the resources unilaterally.

Extraterritoriality

A Canadian spokesman introduced this topic with a review of developments in the field, which at times had been a subject of some controversy between the two countries. He concluded that the subject was not currently a cause of difficulty.

Reference was made to the Kennedy-Mathias bill, known as the Oil Windfall Acquisition Act, which had extraterritorial features. It would inhibit energy development in Canada by limiting the field of investment by the Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. oil companies. U.S. participants assured the meeting that the bill would not leave the Senate. While there might be majority support for the legislation, the advocates were not prepared to accept the extended debate which opponents would mount and could sustain in the absence of a "cloture" rule in the Senate.

NORAD Renewal

A Canadian speaker explained that the one-year extension of the agreement had been requested by the Canadian government in order to permit full parliamentary review. There were two new factors to be considered prior to reaching agreement on a longer extension of the agreement: should Canada participate through NORAD in aerospace in addition to air defence? and should the DEW line be replaced by AWACS and if so, who should own and fly the AWACS aircraft?

The U.S. side showed understanding of this situation, which resulted from two elections being held within one year in Canada. However, a U.S. participant expressed a growing concern in the United States that it was carrying a disproportionate share of the Western defence burden. He noted that the proportion of GNP devoted to defence in Canada was one of the lowest among NATO countries.

Draft Treaty on the Third Party Settlement of Disputes

This item was briefly discussed. An American participant expressed the personal opinion that eventually the two countries would have to resort to a device of the kind proposed by the two national bar associations. He wondered whether it might be possible to test the efficacy of the proposal by limiting its application to a couple of treaties.

A Canadian spokesman took a contrary position. He gave a historical account of Canada's experience with several arbitration awards, noting that Canada had never lost land through invasion but had done so as a result of a number of awards against Canadian claims. He expressed strongly the opinion that neither Canada nor the United States would or should agree to refer disputes between them regarding the application of treaties to compulsory arbitration.

COMMITTEE II—ENERGY ISSUES

AGENDA

1. Gas: Alaskan gas pipeline; gas exports to the United States; Arctic liquefied natural gas.
2. Oil: transportation of Alaskan oil; Beaufort Sea drilling; oil supply; future technologies including renewable energy sources.
3. Nuclear energy: bilateral trade; non-proliferation and INFCE; public attitudes.
4. Electricity.
5. Multilateral issues: refugees; 1980 CSCE Madrid meeting; Central America; protection of diplomats; Iran; Afghanistan.

The Alaska Gas Pipeline

The discussions on the Alaska Gas Pipeline were more intensive than for any other topic on Committee II's agenda. In his opening remarks, an American Senator said that a fragile optimism existed at the moment in Washington that the project would go ahead. Meetings were being held between the sponsors of the pipeline and the producers. He himself and Senator Jackson, Chairman of the Senate Energy Committee had met with the Administration to try to persuade the President to amend his decision which was preventing the equity participation by the producers in the project and to give Canada the sort of assurance it was requesting that the whole line would be built. While this would not entail a commitment for government financing, it would be an undertaking to do everything in the power of the United States government to push the project ahead. On the financing aspect, he said the New York financing group would be making its decision in 30 days time.

However, the Senator continued, new Canadian demands and recent decisions by the National Energy Board (NEB) were threatening to jeopardize this delicate situation. There was annoyance, particularly on the part of Congressman Dingell, Chairman of the House Energy Committee, over the Canadian demands for assurance that the whole line would be built; after all, he argued, the pipeline treaty implied just that. Furthermore, why was the NEB now requiring the United States to authorize the tracking of the full cost-of-service tariff and to do so within 30 days—an impossibly short time in an election year. There was a feeling in the United States that, while Canada's idea of building the southern section of the line first had been initially a good one, it had eventually resulted in delaying the construction of the whole line with enormous cost to Alaska. Eighteen months had been spent talking about the prebuild, a delay which made little sense since Canadian authorities had already identified the necessary surplus gas and authorized its export. Rhetoric—particularly government rhetoric—had escalated and had impeded progress.

The Canadian side explained the importance to Canada of getting an assurance from the United States that the whole project would go ahead. It was recognized that the prebuild clearly involved advantages for Canada; there would be a market for Alberta gas, new gas exports would assist Canada's balance of payments and Canadian input in the project would be assured. However, in order to sell the project to the public and to Parliament it was important to reassure Canadians, many of whom were apprehensive that, if the United States found new domestic sources of gas, the Americans might walk away from completing the whole project and decide against bringing the expensive Alaska gas to market. Moreover, there was a perception among many Canadians, particularly in the east, that Canada should not be exporting gas at all but should be expanding eastern Canadian markets. Further, the cost of the project had risen sharply from $11 billion to $27 billion in three years. There was a worry in Canada as to whether or not the whole project was financeable. If a financing plan could be put in place, this would go a long way to reassure Canadians. Why, asked a Canadian delegate, could the producers not participate in the management and financing of the line and take an equity position?

Responding to the American concern over the delays, which had now pushed the completion date to late 1985, it was pointed out by Canadian delegates that Canada had taken all the preparatory steps to ensuring that the project went ahead on time. The necessary legislation had been passed, a Canadian pipeline agency had been established early, and Condition 12 of the Northern Pipeline Act had been modified to make it easier to meet the planned schedule for commencing the prebuild. As amended, Condition 12 now requires Foothills to demonstrate that financing had been obtained for the prebuild and that it could be obtained for the rest of the line in Canada. Further additional gas had been authorized for the prebuild section; 500 billion cubic feet (bcf) through the eastern and western legs and 450 bcf through the eastern leg via ProGas and Consolidated. On the other hand, Canadian delegates pointed out that the United States still had to resolve a number of problems. These included gas prices, the approval for the import of the additional gas authorized by the NEB through the prebuild, as well as the decision by the United States regulatory agency as to whether it will permit the full cost-of-service tariff to be tracked through to U.S. shippers and consumers as soon as the mainline was completed in Canada whether or not the rest of the line in the United States was operational. Still unresolved in the United States was the problem of possible equity and management participation by the producers and a new question may arise for review in the light of the recent Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) ruling to "cap" the volume of gas in relation to price increases above $3.45 per million BTUs. This ruling would make it extremely difficult for small Canadian producers to bring new gas on stream. Several members of the Canadian delegation warned that mid-June had been identified as a target date for getting a go-ahead on the prebuild; otherwise, a year's delay would be involved and the pipeline sponsor in Canada would have to start to dismantle. Already the company had lost a number of top executives.

In response, the United States participants explained that the difficulty over equity participation on the pipeline by the producers stemmed from the extreme sensitivity in the United States over any merger activity by multinational oil companies. The feeling was widespread that the Alaska producers would make millions. Accordingly, the Administration had included in the legislation a provision that prevented these companies from holding an equity position and Congress had ratified it. However the President could use his authority and waive this decision. An American participant reviewed the cost of the various sections of the line and commented that there was no problem with the financing of the western leg in the United States nor the Canadian section. Another American Senator pointed out that while the Alaska producers had not yet decided on a well-head price for the gas, this was extremely difficult to do for gas which would be delivered much later.

In response to the remark that many Canadians particularly in the east were hesitant about exporting any gas, an Alaskan Senator retorted that it had been Canada after all which had first sought to build a gas pipeline with the United States. The United States had had the El Paso liquefied natural gas (LNG) project planned as a method to bring the gas down from Alaska. Furthermore he said that during the period in which the price tag on the project had doubled, the price of Canadian gas had gone "sky high", tripling in price. This delegate also questioned whether the whole project could not still be "scuppered" by Canada's new LNG Arctic Pilot Project. He warned that if the prebuild section was not built there would be no mainline. When queried on this last point, the Senator replied that the whole line had not yet been designed. The design costs alone which related to the time frame of the prebuild were going to cost $500 million.

In explaining the United States delays in the project another American Senator reminded the Canadian delegates that the pressure for getting the Alaska gas had been temporarily reduced by a number of factors including the mild winter, the natural gas deregulation in the United States and the fact that there was currently a gas bubble. Further, cost of the pipeline was an important factor and Congress was not going to write out a blank cheque. There was also a certain scepticism regarding the U.S. pipeline sponsor himself who had failed to bring the parties together satisfactorily. Another delegate mentioned the annoyance of American steel companies over the Canadian specification for 56-inch pipe, a size for which they had no productive capacity.

Nonetheless, the Alaskan Senator pointed out there was a real incentive for the companies to get the gas out of Alaska since they had to put it back in the ground at a considerable cost. If there were a transportation system in place the producers would certainly get it out. Other delegates agreed with the observation by a Canadian participant that displacement of expensive crude oil and independence from OPEC was going to be very expensive for the United States no matter how they proceeded. As for the criticism of the Canadian regulatory authorities, a Canadian participant stated that perhaps the government had been in the way for the prebuild, but it was necessary to have both governments overseeing the whole line. The Alaskan delegate added that there had been a regulatory maze in the United States.

Another Canadian participant said that one of the dangers perceived by Canada in a stand-alone prebuild related to the limited supplies of Canadian gas which had been authorized for export, that is a six to eight year flow of about 4½ trillion cubic fell (tcf). A major problem would arise if Canadian supplies had to be cut off after this period and the United States had not moved ahead to bring Alaskan gas down. This should not be a problem, replied the Alaskan Senator. Canada should give the United States a firm commitment or contract for 7 years' supply just as any commercial enterprise would enter into a business contract.

The first part of the discussion concluded with a statement from the Alaskan Senator that if Canada were to get the sort of undertaking it wanted from the United States to build the whole pipeline and then, in the final analysis, no private financing was found possible, "the court of last resort would be United States government funding."

When the discussion on the Alaska Gas Pipeline resumed after luncheon, Canadian participants sought clarification as to the possibility of Canada obtaining the assurances it had requested from the United States Administration regarding not only a commitment to the whole project but also a framework of agreement as to the part to be played by the sponsors and the producers in the financing and management of the pipeline and the Alaska conditioning plant.

The Senator from Alaska reiterated that the Canadian demands for assurances with their implicit threat that there might be no pipeline were counterproductive. However, he said he and Senator Jackson in their meeting with the President and Energy Secretary Duncan had urged that the President exercise his authority to waive the provision in the Alaska Gas Transportation Act PL 94 586 which prevented equity participation by producers. Normally, Congress would then have 60 days to approve the President's action. There could still be financing problems with the banks, he said, and a question remained as to whether the producers would participate financially without a management role. Nevertheless the producers had an incentive to sell the gas and once the prebuild was started, the financial world would be much less reticent.

The Senator explained further that some vehicle to reassure Canada was currently being worked on by his own staff and the staff of the Department of Energy but there were several difficulties. One was congressman Dingell's intransigence vis-à-vis the Department of Energy and another was the fact that Mr. Macmillian, the United States pipeline sponsor, had told Congressman Dingell there would be no need for a government guarantee for the line. The Senator added that he had lost, by only 5 votes, an amendment to the Oil Windfall Acquisition Act, which would have provided a method of financing the Alaska gas transportation system. Now the producers would have to finance the gas after the tax. Their commitment could be in the neighbourhood of $5 billion. The State of Alaska had agreed to finance the conditioning plant and neither the financing of the eastern and western legs in the lower mainland would be a problem. It was the danger of cost overruns in the northern overland section which presented the difficulty. The Senator concluded that even if the Administration took the action requested by June, Congress could not possibly deal with it within the 30 day time frame.

A Canadian Senator stated that from the discussion he understood that while there would be no government guarantee, an assurance or a moral commitment to the whole pipeline would be forthcoming from the United States; that the producing companies would be permitted to take an equity position in the pipeline; and that there was some thought that the prebuild should be on a stand-alone basis with the gas financing out in about 8 years. The Alaska Senator replied he was unsure of the economics of the third situation.

Gas exports to the United States

A United States Senator commented that in his state in the northwest, 70 percent of energy was supplied by Canadian natural gas. Because of the recent price hikes, there was a marked tendency by industry to convert to other sources. As a result, the reduced volume has increased delivery costs further.

Moreover the conversions are putting pressure on other utilities. Homes are being built for all-electricity consumption and coal is having a come-back in industry. However it was true that in California everyone still wanted natural gas.

A Congressman noted that the House of Representatives had recently voted overwhelmingly to reverse the 1979 law on incremental pricing of natural gas. This legislation had provided for a dual price structure involving a higher price for industry and a lower protected price for consumers. But the provision was reversed when industry began converting very quickly away from gas.

A Canadian spokesman noted a trend away from natural gas to residual fuels but considered it to be a temporary phenomenon only. He himself considered that the only effective way to promote conservation was by higher prices. At present, he said, Alberta producers had 4½ tcf of natural gas which had been identified as surplus and authorized for export. They were anxious to get it to market to get the necessary cash flow; otherwise small producers would have to stop drilling.

It was not surprising, he said, that the United States was unhappy with the rapid increase in Canadian prices. Nonetheless, looked at from Canada's point of view it made sense to base the price of exported natural gas on what it costs to import a substitute product. In reply, an American Senator said he understood Canada's position but he wondered if the price relationship tied as it was to imported oil prices was the correct formula in view of the present rapid rate of substitution in the United States. Delegates commented that at the present time the market mechanism was at work and the price might be currently too high in view of available alternative sources.

Arctic liquefied natural gas

A Canadian spokesman explained that at present there are approximately 20 tcf of natural gas in the Arctic Islands and the Beaufort Sea. The Arctic Pilot Project was designed to ship 250 million cubic feet a day (mmcfd) from Melville Island by two icebreaking tankers. There were some problems however; it was necessary to obtain permission from Greenland to transit Greenland's waters; a market for the gas had to be found; there was at present no Canadian capability for constructing the required tankers; and there was the question of cost. At present Petro Canada was negotiating a gas sales contract with Tenneco and hoped by June 1980 to file an application with the National Energy Board. The gas could be shipped to a port on the east coast.

Another Canadian participant underlined the environmental and socio-economic problems associated with this project. The sea ice along the route was incredibly thick, there would be significant problems with icebergs and the Inuit population at the top end of Baffin Island on Lancaster Sound was opposed to the project.

The transportation of Alaskan oil

A Congressman reviewed the President's decision to choose the all-American Northern Tier line as the route to bring Alaskan oil to northern border states. The President's fall-back position if the Northern Tier line were found to be not financeable would be the Canadian Trans-Mountain route. In both cases environmental problems could be lessened by keeping tanker traffic out of Puget Sound, off-loading the oil at an outside port such as Port Angeles, and subsequently piping it to inside refineries. Another delegate added that while the recent eruption of Mt. St. Helens had alarmed environmentalists who feared a pipeline in the area would be vulnerable to such shocks, they could be reassured that a pipeline across Puget Sound would not have been affected.

A Canadian Senator protested that the Northern Tier proposal continued to suffer from the same defect as last year. To be viable it would need a supply of at least 700,000 barrels of oil per day (bpd) but at present only about 200,000 bpd of Alaska crude was surplus and available. Accordingly, additional imports from overseas would be needed which would negate the President's policy of decreasing oil imports.

An Alaskan Senator responded that this viewpoint failed to take into consideration the fact that with the use of heavy oils increasing in California, less Alaska crude would be used there, thus freeing it for Puget Sound refineries. Also, there were two very promising new oil shows in the Beaufort Sea, that is, in state waters within the Barrier Islands. This was rumored to be possibly another "Prudhoe Bay" and could be put into production very quickly. In addition, the Jackson amendment to the Lands Bill would now allow seismic work in the potentially very rich Arctic Wildlife Range in Alaska. All of this meant there could be a surplus in three to five years. Further if there is a downturn in interest rates the Northern Tier would be financeable, so the Senator concluded that the Northern Tier could be underway by 1983 to 1985.

When asked by Canadian delegates if there would be interest in an oil pipeline through Canada to avoid having heavy tankers plying the west coast and also to minimize any offshore strategic danger, the Alaska Senator responded firmly in the negative. He said no United States President would make the same mistake twice and he himself would never again go through the process they had faced with the gas pipeline. After an early understanding with Canada and the pipeline, the whole thing had got out of hand. A Canadian delegate interjected the comment that businessmen on both sides of the border considered that the United States regulatory agencies have been at fault. In the case of an oil line the Alaska Senator remarked firmly there could be no regulatory interference with the existing right-of-way. He continued that if Canadian oil were found in the Beaufort, (and a Canadian delegate had briefly referred to the speculative Kopanoar find) it could prove advantageous for Canada to bring it ashore in Alaska.

Oil supply

The delegations touched briefly on the question of oil supply. A Canadian delegate spoke of the lingering misapprehension in the United States that Canada had lots of oil. In fact Canada was a net importer of oil. It was true that some oil was exported to the Northern Tier states in exchange for equivalent imports from the United States into Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. In addition there is a modest export of heavy crude and liquefied petroleum gases.

There were some encouraging signs from Canadian exploratory activity both in the Beaufort Sea and off the east coast. After an expenditure of about $1 billion, there were now oil showings in 4 out of 5 Beaufort Sea drillings. Off the east coast almost another billion dollars had been spent before a very positive showing resulted at the Hibernia site off Newfoundland. Even if these finds proved to be commercially successful however, it must be remembered that a long lead time of about 10 years was required before the oil was available to consumers. In any case, Canada had committed itself at the Tokyo summit to hold its net imports to 600,000 bpd.

Future technologies including renewable energy sources

United States delegates stated that the production of synthetic fuel from oil shale in the United States involved a complex technology and resulted in a very high cost per barrel. One delegate was optimistic that the oil shale operations could become economic within 5 years but another participant was doubtful pointing to the record of such projects undertaken by major U.S. oil companies. No such plant was in operation in the United States and a number had been abandoned. In Canada, despite certain difficulties, several tar sand plants were in operation producing about 100,000 barrels a day at economic prices and further projects were being scheduled.

It was noted that in California there were huge tertiary oil reserves (about 20 billion barrels) which were not recoverable by conventional means and therefore not economically feasible to produce at present oil prices. Further price rises could change that picture, however.

On the question of renewable energy sources, the Canadian spokesman explained that Canada's funding in this area had risen to approximately $20 million by 1980. If hydro electric power generation were included, renewable energy sources accounted for 25 to 28 per cent of the country's energy needs although in the spokesman's own area in eastern Canada it accounted for almost half. Canada was concentrating on increasing renewable energy from two particular sources: the increased use of forestry resources and wood wastes and the application of solar heating. Encouraged by government grants, increased use of wood residues was displacing the use of other fuels in the forestry industries. In addition woodstoves were making a comeback with an estimated 100,000 homes being converted to use surplus wood for fuel. Canada had the potential to produce large quantities of methanol (replacing as much as 10 per cent of its energy needs) from a variety of sources but there were unresolved problems as to how to keep it from separating in cold weather when mixed with gasoline. Both employment and the development of important new technology were additional advantages in this area. Some interesting experimental work had been done with wind turbines in eastern Canada.

An American Senator described the new United States synthetic fuel legislation which authorized the spending of over $20 billion over 10 years. At a rate of $2 billion a year, there would be considerable stimulation of alcohol production, of conversions to ethanol and methanol from waste agricultural products and from both urban and industrial garbage, some support for solar energy sources but only a modest amount for wind energy development which was viewed as a viable alternative only in remote areas where all other sources were very expensive. Direct wood consumption and gasification and liquefaction of coal would also be promoted. However, despite the possibility of other new ideas such as hydrogen power, delegates agreed that there was no one quick, easy solution to current fuel needs to be found in the area of renewable energy sources.

Nuclear issues

Public attitudes in the United States toward nuclear energy were becoming increasingly negative said a Congressman. Polls showed a drop from 63% to 50% of those who favoured nuclear power and a rise in those opposed from 19% to 38%. The Three Mile Island incident had had a significant and lasting impact and had been exaggerated by the attendant publicity. Another factor was the influence of demonstrators with leaders such as Jane Fonda, who purposely climbed fences in order to invite arrest. As a result, the United States had drastically scaled down its plans for construction of nuclear plants. However, the majority in Congress still remained favourable to nuclear power as a known source of energy.

There was a dilemma for governments, a Canadian participant pointed out, in trying to decide whether it was helpful to try to get a consensus on nuclear issues through public hearings and debate. In Austria and Sweden public debates had produced differing results at the polls. The Ontario government was facing this problem in its search for nuclear waste disposal sites. While a Canadian Senator thought Ontario would have no problem, another Canadian spokesman stated that neither the responsible Ontario authority nor the nuclear industry recognized the existence of a popular mystique of fear of nuclear radiation and they had failed to give out sufficient information. Any perception that information was being held back only increased public apprehension, he said.

In Canada, over 9% of total Canadian electricity is generated from nuclear sources, at the present time all in Ontario. Canadian participants pointed out that Canada had the whole spectrum of reactions to nuclear power generation. For example, in British Columbia a province with abundant energy supplies, there was even a ban on exploration for uranium and strong opposition to nuclear plants. The plants were more acceptable in Ontario, Quebec or New Brunswick where other energy forms were more expensive or scarce. A number of delegates considered that there would inevitably be a difficult political problem over nuclear waste disposal as no one wanted it in his "backyard" even though, technologically scientists thought there were a number of safe methods of disposal. There was also apprehension over the trucking of waste disposal. The group agreed that there was a widespread fear that a nuclear power plant could blow up like a bomb, a concept only public education could change.

In explaining the cancellations and the cutbacks in the growth of nuclear power plants in the United States, a United States Senator pointed to the political impact of public perceptions, the slowdown in the rate of energy growth which was related to the GNP slowdown in the wake of the oil embargo and the risk of utility companies or state governments being tied up in legal battles in the courts by challenges through the regulatory authorities. The latter was perhaps the main reason why so few operating permits for nuclear plants had been issued. A California participant said that in his state in 7 years not one nuclear power plant had been licensed; near San Francisco a huge plant was completed but no permit had been granted. While there was currently a strong movement to convert to coal the Congressman pointed to the very high fatality and injury rate in coal mines compared to the fact that not one single fatality and not one serious injury was associated with the 72 existing reactors.

The Congressman stated that he was unabashedly a supporter of nuclear-generated power. Moreover he supported the reprocessing of by-products of the American nuclear plants rather than their disposal. The Administration, he said, was currently pushing a policy of waste disposal and he acknowledged there was an understandable concern over the security of the resulting production of plutonium. But he considered the economic benefits of reprocessing to be of such major importance that it should be pursued. The energy available from spent fuel now discharged annually from the operating reactors is equal to 250 million barrels of oil. If the breeder reactor, a further stage of reprocessing, was utilized, the energy equivalent would be raised to about 12 billion barrels of oil annually or about 6 times the amount of oil imported by the United States. This delegate stated that two committees of the House of Representatives had reflected some of the same feelings that "this existing resource should not be thrown away." A United States Senator responded that the reprocessing issue was politically particularly difficult although he himself also favoured it. He considered that the United States was deluding itself as to its influence in its policy. Other major countries were going right ahead with reprocessing and breeder technologies.

The difficulties which Canada was having in selling the Candu reactor was discussed as well as the fact that it had a very high safety and operating record. One delegate said there was a real possibility of the Candu dying without a market. A Canadian delegate questioned whether the United States would be interested in buying the nuclear-generated electricity from Canadian Candu plants built along the border for exporting purposes. This would mean the United States would not have to get them licensed nor to look after the wastes and it would further provide economic benefit for Canada. Another Canadian added that New Brunswick was already contracting to sell some of the power to be generated from its new nuclear plant to the United States. A United States Congressman replied that he thought Americans would take electricity wherever they could get it. A Senator replied that while he would rather see the United States become self-sufficient and build its own plants, he considered that Canada would be very wise to invest currently in this energy source. Although it might look like very heavy initial capital expenditures, the subsequent delivery costs of this energy would be extremely favourable.

There was a brief discussion of the results of the International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation (INFCE) which completed its two-year study earlier this year. From this study had emerged a number of recommendations for further examination including the need for an international regime for spent fuel storage, international management for separated plutonium from reprocessing plants and improved International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) safeguards. The proposal for an international research centre for the development of fusion technology was also mentioned. This project would be funded by the major countries including the United States and the USSR as there was no possible military application. It was thought that a third country, perhaps Canada, would be an appropriate place for this centre and both Quebec and British Columbia were anxious to have it.

A Canadian delegate asked why the United Sates had agreed to sell enriched uranium to India. An American Congressman responded, agreeing the 1978 legislation forbids the sale of enriched uranium to countries such as India which are not signators of the non-proliferation treaty (NPT) and do not have their nuclear facilities under full-scope safeguards. In the case of these exports, the Congressman explained there had been a diversity of opinions. The State Department had recommended that the export license applications be issued, but the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) was opposed because it could not certify as to what would happen to the material in India. In the President's overriding decision to permit the exports, a number of factors were prominent including broad foreign policy considerations. The stability of the region was threatened by the Russians in Afghanistan. They were probably ready to supply India's needs and Pakistan was thought likely to be building a bomb. It was considered prudent to try to maintain as much control as possible over the reprocessing and disposition of US-origin fuel in India; that is to be a reliable supplier and to keep control.

Electricity

Canadian spokesmen noted that Canada exports 9.4% of its electricity to the United States amounting to a $750 million net surplus. One delegate thought there would be opportunities to increase electricity exchanges across the border since the two countries had complementary peak load demand periods but another Canadian thought that overall Canadian electricity exports could be reduced.

In the United States it was noted that there were widely differing regional perceptions concerning electricity. With huge rate hikes, some areas were anxious to convert from oil and gas to coal but other regions were wary of the increased acid rain. The progress toward electric automobiles was considered a hopeful sign. General Motors was predicting that 25% of cars could be electrically powered by 1985. Delegates considered that cheap electrical generating systems would become increasingly rare, that nuclear power had very low operating costs and that various nuts and bolts systems would have to be implemented.

COMMITTEE III—ENVIRONMENT AND FISHERIES ISSUES

AGENDA

1. Air quality—Acid rain.
2. Disposal of Toxic Wastes.
3. Transborder Environmental issues: Dickey Lincoln; Atikokan; Garrison; Cornwall; Eastport; Migratory Caribou.
4. East Coast Fisheries and Boundary Treaty.
5. West Coast issues: Halibut; West Coast Boundaries; Tuna; Salmon; Tanker routes.

Air Quality—Acid Rain

A spokesman for the Canadian delegation opened the discussion by reviewing briefly the known causes and effects of acid rain. He noted that it was especially harmful in some areas of Canada because of the inadequate "buffering" capacity of the soils. He warned that, if current trends continued, within 15 years thousands of lakes, especially in Ontario, would have no aquatic life. He went on to describe a major Canadian study of the long-range effects of acid rain including potential massive damage to forest growth. It was clearly established that most of the Canadian problem arises from pollution originating in the United States. For this reason, Canadian concern has been greatly heightened by the President's recent proposal of coal conversion legislation which would allow substantial increases in sulphur and nitrogen oxide emissions in the northeastern United States. He concluded that the Canadian government now doubted that the U.S. government was prepared to treat the problem of acid rain with the seriousness it deserved.

A U.S. participant responded with the assertion that the United States was very concerned about acid rain because parts of the United States, especially the New England states, were as heavily affected as Canada. The New England caucus in Congress had recently expressed great concern about the problem. He went on to note that Mr. Costle, head of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), had expressed opposition to features of the President's coal conversion proposal and had called for greater emission controls.

Another Congressman reported that the President's proposal included some $400 million for pollution abatement, but he was unable to say whether it took the form of tax relief or grants to companies. He repeated the assurance that the problem was taken seriously in the United States and noted that his own state in the South-east was affected by emissions from Pittsburgh.

The Canadian spokesman responded that, while it was understood in Canada that some officials in the U.S. government, in particular Mr. Costle, were concerned about acid rain, it nevertheless seemed that energy consideration had priority. It was well understood in Canada that "we must clean up our own mess" in order to make the best possible case to the United States government. Several members of the Canadian delegation reported on the recent actions by the Ontario government to require reductions in emissions from the INCO smelters in Sudbury, and described this a "major program".

The discussion then turned to the question of future energy sources, and the extent to which the United States would continue to look to nuclear energy. A Californian Congressman observed that a recent plebiscite had shown that the citizens of California favoured proceeding with nuclear power, but Governor Brown was doing everything in his power to stop development. Another U.S. delegate pointed out that the mounting costs of nuclear power were slowing down development as much as political opposition. As the United States approached the phase-out of its first generation of plants, there were major unresolved questions about what to do with these plants.

The Canadian spokesman noted that Canada was approaching a major decision on how to proceed with the nuclear issue and specifically whether a major public debate on the question was desirable. He suggested that European experience showed that, where debate preceded action, as in Sweden, there was more likely to be support for nuclear power.

Disposal of Toxic Wastes

A U.S. spokesman identified two American concerns: first, the opposition by a number of Canadian towns to the SCA Chemical Waste Service Inc. treatment and disposal plant situated on the Niagara River in New York State and, second the Canadian request for a one-year exemption to the May 1, 1980 closing of U.S. borders to the importation and exportation of PCBs. On the latter point, he stated flatly that the U.S. government would not grant such an exemption.

A Canadian participant responded that the SCA issue was mainly a local, emotional issue and that Canadian officials were satisfied with the standards being applied by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. In the case of PCBs, the problem was one of federal-provincial jurisdiction. Canada believed that cement-kiln disposal constituted a promising technology, but experiments had been stopped owing to public opposition. Canada was working on the problem and understood that further exemption from the border closing decision would not be granted by the U.S. government.

Transborder Environmental Issues

Dickey Lincoln

A U.S. speaker expressed the view that the proposed Dickey Lincoln hydro-electric project was a good one, although it was uncertain whether funds would be provided for it in the current budget. Much would depend on the position of the former Senator for Maine, now Secretary of State, Edmund Muskie.

A Canadian participant explained that, while there was some concern about the flooding of land in Quebec, from the point of New Brunswick and the Maritimes there were advantages in the project. He added that reports of plans for developing the Allagash River caused some alarm, but was told that these plans were no longer part of the project.

Atikokan

A Canadian participant reported that the capacity of the Ontario Hydro coal-fired thermal generating plant in Atikokan, Ontario had been reduced from 800 megawatts to 400 and, as well, new Ontario emission control standards which would involve the installation of scrubbers, would be applied to the plant. In short, the problem was "now eliminated", information which was welcomed on the U.S. side.

Garrison

A Canadian spokesman expressed concern that the United States still planned to proceed with a smaller, scaled-down, or phased-construction, version of the Garrison Diversion. He declared Canada's continued opposition to any such plans and expressed the hope that Congress would stop funds for the project. Canada's fear was that the more money was spent, the greater would be the tendency to complete the project.

A U.S. participant was uncertain what assurance he could give, other than to say that the United States would live up to its treaty obligations. He informed the Canadian delegation that there were no funds for the project in the President's proposed budget for 1980-81. Another Congressman added that there was a great deal of opposition to the project in Congress.

Cornwall

A Canadian delegate commented briefly on the problem of fluoride emissions from the Reynolds aluminum plant in Massena, N.Y harming animal and possibly human life on the St. Regis Indian Reservation on Cornwall Island. He reported that emissions had been reduced and that further study was underway.

Eastport

Concerning the proposal by a New York company to build an oil refinery at Eastport Maine, a U.S. spokesman declared flatly: "It will never be built. Mr. Muskie is against it and the EPA is against it." That terminated the discussion to the satisfaction of the Canadian delegates.

Migratory Caribou

A U.S. spokesman insisted that the treaty was unnecessary. He had been informed by the U.S. State Department that the Canadian government wanted a treaty in order to control the take of the caribou by the native people in Canada. But in his view this action would unacceptably interfere with the jurisdiction of Alaska. He concluded by saying: "It is your problem. Why don't you control your own people? Why do we need a treaty?".

A Canadian participant explained that the Council of Yukon Indians was concerned about depletion of the herds but would not support any agreement on herd management unless it had assurances of similar controls on the American side. Canada was aware that the potential for economic development, in particular oil and gas discoveries, was greater in U.S. territory than in Canada and that any agreement must take this into account. It was suggested that there was need of a Bilateral Advisory Committee and some agreement on quotas.

The U.S. spokesman replied that the caribou were on the U.S. side of the border for only a short time each year—the six weeks calving period—and that Alaska would never sacrifice them to economic development. He observed that Alaska had done a good job of managing the herd since 1961 and there was no evidence of excess killing. He repeated that it was a Canadian problem, that only a few environmentalists in Alaska wanted the treaty and that most regarded the proposal as a "bureaucratic nightmare". At the same time, he said that if the main objective were only an agreement on quotas, something could be worked out. However, Alaska would not support a treaty providing for habitat control and as far as he was concerned "the treaty is dead".

East Coast Fisheries and Boundary Treaty

The Canadian spokesman opened the discussion by expressing grave concern that Americans did not understand how strongly Canadians felt about possible Senate failure to ratify the treaty. He declared that it was a subject of great urgency in Canada, that it made national headlines and had the potential to affect general bilateral relations. However, he recognized that it would serve no useful purpose at this meeting to get into the details of the treaty. He suggested that delegates need only arrive at a mutual appreciation of how serious a problem this was and called for the convening of a special meeting of the group in Washington, where Canadian parliamentarians could make their case to those members of the Senate directly concerned with the issue. He wanted, nevertheless, to emphasize several features of the situation. First, that the agreements were the result of 18 months detailed negotiations in which there was give and take on both sides. Second, that by unanimous resolution, the House of Commons had recently called for ratification of the Treaty and, finally, that the two sides were very close to serious trouble on the Georges Bank as the result of heavy overfishing by American fishermen and depletion of the stocks.

A U.S. Senator, representing the views of his colleagues in the Senate, replied that there was a strong feeling that the chief U.S. negotiator—Lloyd Cutler—had been outbargained by the Canadians because he did not have the same background in the issues and had failed completely to get the support of the fishing industry as he went along. The source of the trouble was that "our fishermen were not involved in the negotiations." Turning to the details of the treaties, he pinpointed three major U.S. objections: first, the treaties were permanent rather than for a limited term; second, the shares of new stocks favoured Canada; and third, the joint management régime set up by the agreement would unduly interfere with the jurisdiction of the newly established Regional Fisheries Council. On this latter point, the Senator recommended that Canada create similar councils and leave the settlement of such issues to the respective regional interests in the two countries. He suggested that a special meeting in Washington would be a good idea and perhaps productive if these points could be discussed and resolved. Otherwise, he concluded, there was no way the treaty would be passed this year.

Several members of the Canadian delegation took strong exception to these remarks. A participant from the Maritimes pointed out that while the treaties were permanent, the shares assigned initially were subject to review every ten years. Concerning new stocks, she argued that it was impossible to say that the shares were unfairly divided because the experience of both countries with these species was so limited. Another delegate declared that there was no question of a group of parliamentarians going to Washington to renegotiate the treaties. "As far as we are concerned, the sole purpose of such a meeting would be to press the Senate to ratify the treaties." He went on to argue that this practice of the Senate reopening negotiations already concluded by the Administration would cause great trouble in Canada-U.S. relations. "What is the point if we are going to get bled first by the Administration and again by the Senate?". He then criticized the apparent willingness of the U.S. Senate to allow the terms of such a major agreement to be dictated by regional interests.

Another Canadian challenged the suggestion that turning the issue over to regional or industry interests would settle the matter. "You would have chaos if the fishermen fight it out." He pointed out that there are regional advisory bodies with industry representation in Canada and that their recommendations are taken very seriously by the federal government, "but the federal government is finally responsible." He went on to suggest that the situation in the United States was not so very different, because the Regional Councils were established by Congress, had federal government as well as industry representation on them and were subject to veto by the federal government. He concluded his remarks by allowing that some room for negotiation might exist on the time frame of the treaties.

The discussion concluded with the two sides agreeing that a meeting in Washington might be useful, but that it would have to take place with no pre-conditions or implications that the terms of the treaty were open to negotiation. The meeting would afford "an exchange of views" and nothing more.

West Coast Issues

Halibut

A Canadian participant opened the discussion by noting the shortfall in the Canadian take of halibut last year and the overfishing by Americans. However, compensation in this fishing season had been worked out to the satisfaction of the Canadians. At the same time, he noted somewhat greater reluctance on the part of the Canadian fishermen to enter into longer term negotiations on the Halibut convention because of the fate of the East Coast Treaty. He added that the only problem on halibut at the moment was the difficulty of getting accurate counts on the take to shore quickly so that overfishing by the fleets could be prevented. He inquired about the current mood of American halibut fishermen and was assured that there were no major dissatisfactions or objections.

West Coast Boundaries

There was a brief exchange on this subject. A Canadian delegate observed that nothing relating to boundaries would be settled on the West Coast until the East Coast was settled. A U.S. participant replied that in his view West Coast boundaries were nothing to lose sleep over because in 12 years there had been only 3 incidents. He urged Canadians not to create problems where there were none.

Tuna

A Canadian opened this discussion by noting the unusual movement of tuna close to the Canadian shore last year, and the resulting arrest by Canada of U.S. tuna boats in Canadian waters. Another Canadian noted that the United States was one of only 2 countries signatory to the Law of the Sea agreement which claimed the right to pursue highly migratory species such as tuna within the 200-mile zone. He went on to say that Canada thought it had an agreement last year to extend such rights to U.S. tuna fishermen in return for reciprocal Canadian rights on herring.

A U.S. delegate replied that the United States was not interested in linking tuna and herring, but that it would exchange landing rights for Canadian and American tuna fishermen. A Canadian pointed out that this was of no interest to Canada since, unlike the United States, it did not have a large seagoing tuna fleet. He concluded that the question would not be resolved until the United States recognized Canadian jurisdiction within the 200 mile zone.

Salmon

The Canadian spokesman briefly described the background to the Pacific salmon negotiations which have gone on for almost ten years. He noted that considerable progress had been made, but that there remained the question of equitable division of the take, especially by Canadian fishermen as the salmon enter the Straits of Juan de Fuca. He recommended the principle that the country which provides the enhancement program should have fair access to the species. A U.S. participant agreed with this principle and that, based on its enhancement programs on the Fraser River, Canada deserved a fair share of the take in Juan de Fuca. He went on to say, however, that these were really problems of the past—of "allocating shortages"—whereas there were bumper stocks coming along as a result of highly successful enhancement programs. He concluded: "We have proved the benefits of good management. Let's not fight over shortages we don't face."

Tanker Routes

A Canadian delegate opened this discussion by saying that it now looked like most Alaskan oil would be coming down the coast by tanker and that naturally the residents of the coast were apprehensive about environmental damage. He noted that there were an increasing number of tar balls appearing on shore and inquired about the controls being applied by the United States. A U.S. delegate replied that this pollution was not coming from the big American tankers transporting Alaskan oil but from the small "rust-buckets" which were bringing foreign oil into Puget Sound. He said that the American vessels were sealed and carefully inspected and that the U.S. supported tighter controls on foreign vessels.

To a Canadian suggestion that there should be a bonding system on vessels to provide compensation in the event of damage, a U.S. speaker replied that there was $100 million in such a compensation fund already and that the fund might be increased to $500 million. He concluded this discussion by observing that the Northern Tier route might still be feasible.

PLENARY

Plenary discussion began on the morning of Monday, May 26 with a stimulating presentation by a prominent futurist, Mr. John Naisbitt, senior Vice-President of Yankelovich Skelly and White on the theme of the "The New Economic and Political Order". Mr. Naisbitt described 4 powerful trends that are restructuring the United States and, to varying degrees, other developed countries: the decentralization of decision-making; the redistribution of labour and production in the global economy; the co-development of new technology and new human relations; and the restructuring of the work environment from top-down to bottom-up. This was followed until mid-morning by general discussion on the issues raised in that address.

The plenary discussion thereafter turned to multilateral issues and in particular the situations in Iran and Afghanistan. A U.S. delegate was first to speak, questioning whether the Western nations had not been better off with the Shah. He observed that the United States had obviously lost control of events and that it was wise to let matters cool off for the moment. The American side also expressed gratitude to Canada for the part it played in the harbouring and escape of hostages from Teheran and for its subsequent support on the Olympic boycott and the embargo.

The opening Canadian speaker adopted a broad perspective. He expressed concern about the unfolding of events "East of Suez". He noted recent Russian expansionism and the potenital signifiance of Russia becoming a net oil importer by 1985. This would create a serious situation since the needed oil could come only from the Middle East. The Soviet Union might seek to create additional client states in the area as it had done in Somalia. In these circumstances, it was critical that the United States reaction to the hostage-taking not drive the Iranians into the arms of the Soviets. He urged the United States to view the crisis in a broad context and to exercise great patience in the hope that Iran might yet come down on the neutral or western side.

Several other Canadian delegates spoke up. One commented that Canada was extremely concerned about the impact on international order of the events in Iran. He expressed Canada's sympathy for the American position and declared wholehearted support for the approach taken so far. At the same time, he indicated there was great anxiety about what further steps the presidential election might precipitate. Another Canadian brought up the events in Afghanistan and the Olympic boycott. While Canadians sympathized with the United States, they were also concerned about such unilateral actions as the announcement of the grain embargo which had caused very considerable problems for Canada and Australia. In the case of the Olympic boycott, he asserted that the outcome would have been more successful had there been more consideration. "It was very embarrassing for governments to be contradicted by their national Olympic committees." He concluded that if this pattern of non-consultation were to persist, it would seriously damage the western alliance.

A Canadian Senator declared that Canadians were as divided as Americans on the events in Iran. While some Canadians felt that military intervention might have succeeded had it been tried early, the majority regretted the failure of the rescue attempt. Other Canadians placed the emphasis on the lack of U.S. consultation. One noted that during Mr. Vance's visit to Ottawa, the Canadian government had made clear that it did not favor military action, although another Canadian intervened to make a distinction between military action and a rescue mission.

At this point in the discussion, several of the American delegates entered the discussion. One began by saying that America's allies should not feel badly about lack of consultation "because Congress did not know what was going on either." He suggested that, far from taking precipitous action, the United States had carefully canvassed various options beginning with military action which had been rejected, negotiations which had failed and, finally, sanctions which—in his view—would lead to war. He went on to lament the fact that it is always the United States which is expected to act in these situations, and is then blamed for the actions it takes. Another American delegate expressed the worry that events were moving toward war since the failure of SALT II. However, efforts should be made to diffuse the situation. He reported that there were indications that the Soviet Union was trying to help get the hostages out.

A Canadian delegate intervened to state his opinion that the hostages would remain in Iran for some time to come. He argued that the Ayotollah would never compromise, although those who followed him would do so. He asked "Do you think it is worth going to war because of one fanatic?" In any case, the emphasis should be on the situation in Afghanistan. Another Canadian directed the discussion at this point to the situation in the Middle East by suggesting that the most distabilizing factor in the whole area was the Arab-Israeli conflict. He went on to argue that more pressure should be put on Israel to moderate its position. Another Canadian took up this theme by suggesting that there had been a long standing and deep failure of the West to understand the Arab world and in particular the situation of the Palestinians. He warned that if the West did not learn to deal with comparatively moderate people like Arafat, they would be replaced by a far more radical younger generation.

An American delegate responded at some length to these comments. He observed that the American Jewish community thought that enough pressure was already being put on Israel and that President Carter had run tremendous political risks in going as far as he had. Turning to the events in Iran, he suggested that it was not so much the U.S. government as the media that had been preoccupied with the hostages. He suggested that the President had exhausted every prospect before he had resorted to the rescue mission. Concerning Afghanistan, he noted that it had been communist before the Soviet invasion and that, when consulted, he had urged restraint in the United States response. Nonetheless there had been a strong feeling in the U. S. that this was "the final straw" which had to be responded to. He argued that the main U. S. concern in the "Crescent" was not with its own oil imports but with the economic impact on Europe of a collapse of mid-East oil supply. He warned that if the United States is expected to move men and equipment into the area, they would have to come from NATO. "There is a limit and something has to give." He concluded by wondering why it was the United States which is expected to take these actions on its own.

The afternoon plenary meeting was reserved for the discussion of political developments in the two countries. The Canadian side led off with observations on Canadian constitutional questions in the wake of the Quebec referendum results. A diversity of views was expressed by representatives of the three political parties. This discussion was followed by interesting assessments and informed projections of American delegates on the coming elections in the United States.

The final item for discussion was introduced by the Canadian Co-Chairman from the Senate, who spoke on the long-term relationship between the two countries and the value of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group. (Text of remarks in Appendix I). A Canadian member of Committee III drew the attention of the meeting to the Committee's conclusion that it would be desirable for a Canadian delegation to visit Washington shortly under the auspices of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group to meet members of the Congress and in particular the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to present Canada's concerns regarding the consequences of failure to ratify the boundary and fisheries agreements. Another Canadian delegate reported the wish of Committee I members to arrange a meeting in Ottawa in late July, also under the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group, to discuss the possibility of an agreement between Canada and the United States to stabilize the price of grain.

The meeting concluded with a response by the United States House Co-Chairman to the remarks of the Canadian Co-Chairman. He reflected on the real interests of the Group and how effective the Group could be. An earlier attempt to devise an early warning system had broken down in the case of recent negotiations, but it should be kept alive. It was important to have some impact before legislative actions rather than after it occurred. It seemed to him that in this instance, Canada had a right to be annoyed by Congress' actions. The consultative process needed to be in place for explaining each other's viewpoint on tough bilateral issues. To this end, the staffs on both sides should be encouraged to be watchful.

APPENDIX I

(Text of remarks by the Honourable Hartland de M. Molson, Co-Chairman of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group on the occasion of the 21st meeting in San Diego. May 26, 1980.)

The Canada-U.S. Inter-parliamentary Group last year celebrated its twentieth anniversary. I first attended one of these meetings in 1965. Next year, I shall be retiring as co-chairman. Perhaps it might be helpful if I looked backwards and forwards, by way of introducing a wrap-up session.

Over the years there has been a good balance between continuity and fresh blood. I note Jim McGrath, who attended his first meeting in 1960, and Dan Lang whose service began eight years later. On the U.S. side, the record for long service probably belongs to Biz Johnson, who has participated in most meetings since 1962. And Ted Stevens has been a vigorous contributor to our debates for a decade. Nor should we forget Don Munro's participation as a foreign service officer responsible for organizing the 1959 meeting in Canada which he described to us at our closing dinner last year.

But most of us are newer to the organization and I thought it might be helpful if I reflected a little on how the work and utility of our organization has evolved in two decades.

To orient myself to those earlier meetings, I have compared some of the agendas over the years. Our first big meeting was held in Montreal in 1959 and the focus was very much on current bilateral questions: oil, natural gas, uranium, lead and zinc, iron ore, aluminum, nickel, the St. Lawrence Seaway which was dedicated on the occasion, the role of the IJC, the Columbia River, the Chicago Diversion, better joint management of the Great Lakes basin, the Passamaquoddy Tidal power project, continental air defence, defence production sharing problems, U.S. troops in Canada and development of the Alaskan Highway. I think you will agree that the list is rather timeless. But within three years the orientation of the Group's discussions had swung toward international problems. The June 1961 meeting in Washington focussed on Canadian participation in the OAS, trade with Cuba and with China, the need to strengthen NATO, disarmament, aid to developing countries, and trade groupings in Europe. The only strictly bilateral issues to be addressed were some boundary water issues, tourist exemptions, U.S. investment in Canada and international trade unions.

This emphasis on international problems remained until the end of the 1960s. The consequence was a decline in interest and serious involvement. The Group's historian, Matthew Abrams, writing in 1971, expressed the view that "the influence which the Group has had on even the minor Canadian-American issues is not of a primary sort". But about the same time the Group began a process of revitalization. The agendas were changed to reflect the hard bilateral issues with which our governments were and are faced. In the middle of the decade the important decisions were taken to reduce the social program and to hold the meetings outside our respective capitals to encourage steadier attendance. I think these changes have helped to restore significance and value to our meetings.

Paralleling these changes, it has been apparent to us that there has been a shift of power from the Administration to Congress. This has been one of the dramatic developments of the past decade, culminating in the War Powers Resolution of 1973. This trend has had its impact on Canadian-American relations. There is an increasing number of bilateral problems where the Congress holds a co-equal or even a determining power in policy formulation. Let me illustrate the resulting change of focus in our annual discussions.

The big issue at our 1970 meeting was the Administration's decision to place a quota on Canadian oil imports. In 1971, President Nixon's package of trade measures, notably the import surcharge, was the main subject on the agenda. These were both executive actions. In 1973, the principal item for discussion was the Alyeska pipeline and tankers on the west coast; and while Congress had to vote the right-of-way, the Administration was in the lead. Since the mid-1970s, however, the initiative which has defined our agenda has moved to the Congress. The Garrison Dam proposals have been a perennial source of concern for Canadians. Senator Young from North Dakota has been a moving force on this project. At our 1977 meeting—and ever since—the Convention Tax question has been an irritant and here Congress actually created the condition Canada is objecting to. This year our primary concern has been reservations and resistance in the Senate to the Boundary and Fisheries Treaty, where after negotiating in good faith with a negotiator appointed by your government, we are now being told that this was only the first phase of a two-part negotiation.

In a period when the actions of the Congress are becoming a major causal factor in the relations between our two countries we should reflect on the role of the Canada-U.S. Inter-parliamentary Group. For the past few years we have talked about introducing an early warning system to alert each side to developing problems. We have made some progress. In 1979, for instance, thanks to an awareness resulting from Group meetings, a resolution critical of the seal hunt off Canada's east coast which affects the livelihood of some of our most needy citizens, was referred to the House International Affairs Committee, where it remained, rather than being endorsed unanimously as it had been the year before.

But the kind of issues which I think we should look at are those where interests in one country or another are significantly affected. Can we not make some contribution when larger issues are at stake? I find it interesting that Senator Aiken of Vermont spoke strongly against the Chicago Water diversion bill of 1959, referring in his remarks specifically to the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group. Am I correct in thinking that the traditional pattern in Congress is to support your colleagues unless you have a state or district interest which is adversely affected, or unless you believe the national interest to be prejudiced? In this instance, Senator Aiken apparently defined the U.S. national interest to include good relations with Canada. I am a little disappointed that so few Senators representing states which are directly affected by the Boundary and Fisheries Treaty and who have challenged its provision, have taken the opportunity to attend our meetings in San Diego. And, I am surprised that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has thus far paid so little attention to the possible cost of rejection of the treaty on future relations between Canada and the United States.

The following exchange from our parliamentary Hansard illustrates the point I am making. After the third meeting of our Group in 1960, there was a brief exchange in the House of Commons on the state of bilateral relations. The then Secretary of State for External Affairs chose to comment on a recent visit he had made to Washington where he had been received on the floor of the U.S. Senate. He reported that Senator Mansfield had spoken of Canada as:

> "a nation which is most close to us... we wish for nothing more than a continuing abatement of any differences which may exist and a continuing growth of cordiality and cooperation in all spheres of relations with our great neighbour to the north".

To which Mr. Pearson, then leader of the opposition, replied:

> "May I ask the Minister a question? Is that the Senator Mansfield who is supporting the increase in base metal duties to be imposed against Canadian imports?"

I don't think I need say more. I understand that politics means survival and a defence of local interests. But I do want to leave you with a question. At a time when the Congress has by joint resolution expressed sentiments of good feeling and gratitude far exceeding Senator Mansfield's words, the Congress—or in this instance the Senate—seems reluctant to give much weight to the implications for maintenance of good bilateral relations of rejection of the Boundary and Fisheries Treaty. And the Senate will soon be faced with another treaty—a Tax Treaty—which the border broadcasters are likely to oppose. How much weight will their objections carry? And will anyone speak up for the broader U.S. national interest?

And so I ask you, should it be the responsibility of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group to try to determine and to warn when there may be larger national interests involved in some of these controversies? And if so, is it not up to us, the members of the Group, to speak up and impress these larger interests on our colleagues—as Senator Aiken clearly felt moved to do on the Chicago water diversion the first year our organization was founded?

I confess to have spoken provocatively. That I felt free to do so is testimony to the frankness of our exchanges and the remarkable intimacy of our relationship with you. I have spoken as I would to my own colleagues. I have told you openly, without circumlocution what is on my mind. I have discussed a problem which concerns me and other informed Canadians. I have raised it with you, because valuing the friendship of our two nations, I don't want to see it undermined. I believe our Inter-parliamentary Group can make a contribution in some of these matters. I hope you share my objectives.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 16, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the following message has been received from the House of Commons:

Tuesday, July 15, 1980.

Ordered,—That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that the subject matter of Bill C-214, an Act to amend the Official Languages Act (supremacy of the Act) has been referred to the Special Joint Committee to consider Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Attest

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons

MUNICIPAL GRANTS BILL, 1980

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-4, respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-3, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Jack Austin presented Bill S-11, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, July 29.

Senator Flynn: We are too curious to wait that long.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN BLACK AIRD

TRIBUTES ON APPOINTMENT AS LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF ONTARIO

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, today, on behalf of a number of senators, I should like to pay tribute to a distinguished former colleague of ours, the Honourable John Black Aird.

By the time we return from summer recess, John Aird will have succeeded the Honourable Pauline McGibbon as Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. John Aird has had a long and distinguished career both in the public and private sectors and has made a lasting contribution to our nation.

● (1410)

He had a distinguished career with the Canadian Armed Forces, having served with the Royal Canadian Navy as a lieutenant between 1942 and 1945, following which he practised law and participated in the direction of many leading Canadian companies. He was summoned to the Senate on November 10, 1964.

John Aird devoted himself tirelessly in this place to the study of foreign affairs and defence policy. As honourable senators will recall, he served as Chairman of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association and also as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

He resigned from the Senate in 1974 to assume the chairmanship of the Institute for Research on Public Policy—a so-called "think tank" concerned with government policy on vital issues—which, as the Right Honourable the Prime Minister said at the time, reflected a "continuing concern that public policy in Canada be as well informed as possible." He is presently imparting some of those concerns to young Canadians as Chancellor of Wilfrid Laurier University, a post he has held since 1977; and, as some of us know and understand, it is the only one of the many positions he now holds that he intends to keep during his coming term as Lieutenant Governor of Ontario.

This speaks well of him, for he is a man whom many know as a kind, soft-spoken family man who has always been interested in young people as the source of this country's future.

We all know that John Aird will be a fine Lieutenant Governor of the great Province of Ontario, and he will continue to serve Canada in his own hard-working fashion. In this regard, we can only wish him well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Honourable John Aird is the third member or former member of this house who, in recent times, has agreed to become the lieutenant governor of a province.

We had Senator Robichaud who resigned to become Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick a few years ago. More recently, Senator Côté—Joseph Julien Jean-Pierre, if I am not mistaken—resigned to become Lieutenant Governor because he found it boring here.

John Aird also resigned because he was not overly enthusiastic about the Senate. That was a few years ago, because I think he handed in his resignation in 1974. He could not get used to the ways and customs of the Senate and he returned to very interesting and useful activities for Canada. He has now agreed to become Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, replacing Mrs. Pauline McGibbon who filled that post with outstanding distinction. I had the opportunity to meet her on a few occasions and I think that, on behalf of Canada, we should thank her for the manner in which she discharged her duties.

I consider John Aird as a friend because I had the opportunity to work with him in the Senate and especially because along with the distinguished former Speaker of the Senate, Senator Deschatelets, the Leader of the Government in the Senate at the time, Senator John Connolly, Senator Aird, myself and our wives we made a trip in the Soviet Union in 1970. We went to Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev and Yerevan. We then became close friends. I have therefore been always interested in the activities of my friend John Aird and his wife Jane.

I am therefore pleased to pay them both our tribute and extend to them our wishes in their new career.

[English]

John Aird, as was said by the Leader of the Government, is a man of exceptional ability. Erudite, mild-mannered, unassuming and genial, he is well suited to the type of work that this position calls for. I am quite sure that he accepted these responsibilities out of a sense of duty.

He has tackled with total dedication each task assigned him, and I am sure that he will do likewise in this instance.

• (1415)

He will be well supported in his duties and responsibilities by his extremely charming and able spouse, Jane. To both these sterling Canadians and most amiable friends of mine I wish all the best.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I would like, if I may, to add a few words about John Aird.

He is not only a former colleague of mine, as well as yours, but I have had some years of very pleasant association with him outside of this chamber. The remarks that have been made by the leaders are indeed complimentary, and in thinking about what I could say I had to remind myself that on this occasion, as was the case the other day when we were talking about retirements from the Senate, we must be careful that we do not make our remarks sound like a eulogy. I think that all we want to do in this case is to convey a message of congratulations to our former colleague, and at the same time express our pride in his achievement.

John Aird does not take part in national affairs for any personal gain. His motive has always been that of a keen desire to contribute to his country and its people, which is patriotism in its finest sense. He came to the Senate in 1964 to make a contribution, and he did so in many ways, not the least of which was in the role of Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, where his imagination and innovation greatly extended that committee's usefulness.

When the Prime Minister invited the then Senator Aird to take the chairmanship of the Institute for Research on Public Policy he accepted it in the firm belief that he could make a greater contribution to the country in that way, even though it was necessary for him to resign from the Senate.

Once again, when offered the post of Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, his sense of duty made him accept the sacrifice of his law partnership and of all his directorships. Of course, he set this pattern many years before when he volunteered for active service in the Navy in World War II.

John is a dedicated Canadian. We want to congratulate him and thank him. We are proud that he was one of our colleagues.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Minister of Supply and Services Canada under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part II, Labour Unions) for the fiscal period ended in 1978, pursuant to section 18(1) of the said Act, chapter C-31, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Municipality of Crowsnest in the Province of Alberta, dated June 16, 1980, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970. (English text).

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Leader of the Government following a statement made yesterday by the Right Honourable Prime Minister during his more or less off-the-cuff conference, since he usually has it on Thursdays, concerning his famous letter to Quebecers.

In commenting on this letter, the Right Honourable Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> I have said nothing new. My attitude has always been the same.

Does this mean that he has not changed his mind about constitutional reform—that is, his attitude in favour of the status quo—since the tabling of the infamous Bill C-60?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is anything but the status quo in the attitude of the government with respect to the Constitution. May I remind the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that on May 21 last the Prime Minister said:

> As for us, our only prerequisites for change are the two which I outlined in Quebec as early as January, 1977.
>
> First, that Canada continue to be a real federation, a state whose Constitution establishes a federal Parliament with real powers applying to the country as a whole and provincial legislatures with powers just as real applying to the territory of each province. Second, that a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms be entrenched in the new Constitution and that it extend to the collective aspect of these rights, such as language rights.

[Senator Perrault.]

> I have said at the time and I say again today that we consider everything else to be negotiable.

Surely this is not a statement by a leader who advocates maintenance of the status quo. Yet, there have been those who have continued to attack the government for alleged "inflexibility." They have said that the process of constitutional revision is too rigid and too centralizing. The government rejects that view.

One can understand readily why many Canadians, including those in Parliament, quite properly, are anxious to see constitutional negotiations proceed brilliantly and successfully. Consequently, they profess to be worried about anything that appears to be remotely rigid.

The fact is that the federal government is approaching the whole process of constitutional reform with great flexibility. A number of statements have been made in that direction by others, including those by the Honourable Marc Lalonde and the Honourable Jean Chrétien.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary. Supposing that the statement made by the Right Honourable Prime Minister after the referendum is different from the one he made yesterday during his press conference, if we exclude the possibility of transferring to the provinces some jurisdiction over telephone communications, are there other specific areas where the Prime Minister has said that the provinces could acquire new or more specific jurisdiction?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the entire process of negotiation involves the presentation by the provinces of their views with respect to these and other matters and the presentation by the federal government of its position in respect of certain matters.

As far as the division of certain responsibilities with the provinces is concerned, the Prime Minister, in a statement made on May 29, said:

> At the February 1979 Conference on the Constitution, I repeated what I had been saying for ten years: that I was ready to limit, for example, spending power . . . in fields which the provinces consider to fall under their jurisdiction; or take the federal declaratory power—I have always indicated we were ready to consider limiting it in some economic fields . . .
>
> This remains my attitude . . . But I would not like the provinces to think that I am prepared so far as to abdicate all federal sovereignty and jurisdiction in certain economic fields—

● (1425)

The Prime Minister has suggested the possibility of a discussion on the matters referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, and, indeed, on all matters, in an earnest endeavor to achieve agreement on the new Constitution. If the Leader of the Opposition requires a further supplementary statement, I would be pleased to bring it to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: We will wait until tomorrow.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development, and it is in that capacity and with those responsibilities that I assume he would be aware that the expenditures of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion have declined from 2½ per cent of total government expenditures in 1970-71 to only 1.2 per cent in 1978-79. During that period the income of Canadians in the Atlantic provinces was 34 per cent less in terms of real income in 1974, but in 1978—the last year for which I have any information—it was 35½ per cent less. So it must be clear, even to the minister, that DREE has not produced the results that were hoped for.

With that information in mind and given the ad hoc application of government economic development programs in eastern Canada during the past decade, my question is: When will the government be announcing a comprehensive Atlantic development strategy designed to address the fundamental economic problems of that region?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it seems we will have to go through this exercise every day. Here we are again with the honourable senator saying that his question is predicated on the premise that we have an ad hoc economic development program in eastern Canada. There is a program under DREE that has been operational for a long time. I do not have time in the Question Period to give him the scope of that program, but I would be glad to bring it in here. I would not ask to print it as an appendix to Hansard because the program is so large and comprehensive, but perhaps it could be tabled or sent directly to his office.

He is now asking for another program on top of all that and, of course, from time to time there are going to be modifications to the economic development program, including the activities of DREE. Those announcements are not always made in one package because conditions and priorities change. If the senator would like me to start into that, I could give him a rather long indication of some of the priorities that have changed in the last few months, even without having notes in front of me. Those things ought to be accommodated in the changing priorities that are useful for that part of Canada.

Senator Donahoe: The minister may feel that is a satisfactory and adequate answer, but my question was not premised upon the question of the ad hoc policy as much as it was premised upon the decrease in the percentage of the national revenue allocated to the economic development program in eastern Canada. That decrease has been very significant, and if the minister does not like going through this exercise and thinks that it is an unnecessary exercise, he has a very easy out. All he has to do is to see to it that the things I am complaining about through the medium of this question are rectified. Then I will be happy and instead of standing up in a critical mood I will compliment him on the good results he has achieved with a policy that he says is so broad and comprehensive he could not give it to us here this afternoon.

In the absence of any assurances this afternoon from the minister that his government is concerned enough about economic programs in Atlantic Canada that it will do something to relieve that region's dependence on handouts, will he at least assure us that the DREE budget, which fell 22.4 per cent during the seventies as compared to a 60.6 per cent increase in the expenditures of all other departments, will be upwardly adjusted so as to demonstrate the government's true concern for Atlantic Canada?

• (1430)

Before the minister takes his feet, I should like to say that if he is going to tell me that this is not a question he should be asked, and if he says that the responsibility for an upward increase of the DREE budget is the responsibility of another minister, could we have his assurance that he personally will support the suggestion that the increase be given, and that he will use his influence with the appropriate minister to see that this kind of remedial assistance is given to the Atlantic provinces?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, without agreeing with the preamble, and just setting that aside for the moment, I can tell the honourable senator something he already knows.

Senator Flynn: You never do.

Senator Olson: These preambles usually destroy the premise on which questions are based, so I will forget about it for the moment and tell Senator Donahoe, quite frankly and honestly, that the minister responsible for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion brings in his budget from time to time, and it will be modified by cabinet from time to time. I shall support whatever position the government takes.

Senator Flynn: Blindly.

Senator Donahoe: The minister is so good at finding red herrings that he should be based on the Atlantic coast instead of in the west.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I know what game is being played here, and it is all great fun, but Senator Donahoe knows very well that one does not single out a particular minister and try to get him to commit himself to what he is going to do in a certain area when that area is the responsibility of another minister. That trick has been played as long as I have been around here. The next thing he will say is: "Why didn't you resign if you didn't get what you were promised?"

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: As I understand it, the honourable gentleman has spent some time in a cabinet, so he knows that he is not going to get away with that kind of thing. It is an affront to my intelligence to think that I cannot see through that kind of trickery.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday the minister asked me to do some more homework on the allegations I was making, and I am pleased to say that I have done so. I worked long into the night to do so.

First of all I should like to ask him a question relating to the proposed meeting that was promised with the Canadian shipbuilding industry. I understand that both governments proposed a meeting in March or April of this year, and these talks were abruptly postponed when the new government took over.

Can the minister now tell us if there has been any change in the government's thinking because of the layoffs that will occur in September and October of this year, which will affect a couple of thousand workers? Has he a progress report that he can give us at this time, and can he tell us if the situation is going to be treated urgently?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I gave Senator Marshall a brief answer when he originally asked this question. I then asked him to come back to specifically identify what he was talking about. I looked into the matter and, as usual, I found that the answer I gave him was a good one.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: If I can take just a moment to list some of the firms that will lay off people, they are: Allied (Vancouver), 125 to 175; Belair (North Vancouver), 100 to 150; Fergusson Industries (Nova Scotia), 300 to 350; and, back to Vancouver, 700 people. Rivtose Trades (west coast) will run out of work in September, 1980. They employ 300 to 350 people.

• (1435)

These statistics will help to emphasize the seriousness of the situation. In view of the fact that it was stated in the committee proceedings by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that a new policy might be forthcoming in the fall, could the minister confirm whether it is this fall and before October, when all of these people are likely to be laid off?

Senator Olson: If we are going to get into the details of discussing particular shipyards, that is one thing; but to make sure that my honourable friend is on the right track, I wonder if he would like to go back and check some of his figures. Because there is some interest on the part of other honourable senators, I will take just one example.

The honourable senator has said that there will be 300 layoffs by Fergusson Industries by the fall of 1980. My advice is that there are about 300 people working at that shipyard and that the last delivery they have now under their contracts is for May, 1982. Given that fact, they of course will need some new contracts by late next year. So if that is the kind of information your sources have given you, I suggest it needs some checking.

Senator Smith: Perhaps it is your information that is wrong.

Senator Marshall: Can you pick any faults in the others I listed?

Senator Olson: Yes, I could, but I would rather not do so on a negotiating basis here. I have all of the figures here, and while I do not guarantee that they are right, they are so different from yours that I think we ought to check it out and see which are right. It may be something in between.

Senator Marshall: A short supplementary. Would the minister confirm that this item might be coming before cabinet tomorrow?

Senator Olson: No minister will tell any member what is on the cabinet agenda.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS QUÉBEC

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on May 1, 13 and 15, I put some questions to the Leader of the Government concerning negotiations going on between the government and the Fédération des Francophones Hors Québec. I rise now for the purpose of telling the government leader that I am still awaiting an answer to my question and, in particular, to have an explanation as to why the agreement with the Fédération des Francophones Hors Québec signed by the Secretary of State of the previous government is inappropriate, and what mechanism the government has in mind to put in its place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret very much that I as yet have not been able to obtain the information requested by the honourable senator. A further inquiry will go forward today seeking that information.

GRAIN

POLICY RE SALES TO THE U.S.S.R.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I have been a rather persistent questioner of the minister in respect of Canadian government policy involving grain exports to the Soviet Union and the partial embargo which has been placed on such exports as a result of the action of the U.S.S.R. in Afghanistan.

My question for the minister today is: In view of the fact that the new crop year begins August 1, is the Government of Canada considering any changes in policy insofar as this embargo is concerned?

May I say that I hope that will be the case, because I firmly believe that western farmers have paid a heavy price as a result of that embargo.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am now in a position to make a statement in that regard.

Due to the seasonal features which distinguish the Canadian grain marketing program from those of other exporters, the nature of our traditional trading relationships with the U.S.S.R. and uncertainties concerning the outcome of the Canadian crop, no specific level will be established for Canadian shipments to the U.S.S.R. in the 1980-81 crop year.

It remains Canadian government policy to support the policy of restricting grain exports to the U.S.S.R. Therefore, shipments will be maintained along normal and traditional lines in order to avoid the replacement of embargoed U.S.A. grain with Canadian. The actual level will depend on a number of factors, including the size of the current crop. Export controls are being maintained, and the levels of our trade originating in eastern Canada and in western Canada are being carefully monitored.

Canada's relationship insofar as exports of grain to the U.S.S.R. has been a particular one. We have not had, as have the Americans, formal treaties providing for the shipments of wheat or other grains to the U.S.S.R., and it is interesting that in this day of a partial American embargo, the American government continues to honour the treaty it had for the shipment of some 8 million tonnes of wheat per year to the U.S.S.R.

We feel that the policy of the Canadian government and the policy of the Canadian Wheat Board is that while we do not have with the Soviet Union a formal treaty providing for the sale of certain quantities of grain to that country, nevertheless our particular position with respect to that market, and the position that has been developed and maintained now over many years, is that when the Soviet Union requires additional grain imports it comes to Canada first. We have the first opportunity to supply that market. And so we feel that in the coming year there should not be and there will not be a specific level established for our exports to the Soviet Union. Canada will follow a policy of making available to the Soviet Union levels of grain exports to that nation at our normal and traditional quantities as they have been developed over many years.

I feel with Senator Buckwold that the policy adopted by the former Conservative administration—and I know that hindsight is always easy—was not in fact in the best economic interest of Canada, and so I welcome what I believe to be a reasonable policy, a policy that is in the interest of Canada and in the interest of the grain producers of Canada, and at the same time makes certain that we co-operate with the United States in their partial embargo to ensure that we are not replacing the quantities of grain the United States has withdrawn from that market.

AIRLINES

REQUEST BY EMPLOYEES OF NORDAIR TO PURCHASE SHARES OF COMPANY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Has the government received from a group representing the employees of Nordair a request that those employees be permitted to bid for the purchase of the shares of that corporation owned by Air Canada on the same conditions as have been laid down for the bid of Quebec Air for the same shares?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would have to check to make sure whether some formal application has been made along the lines described by Senator Smith. I can say, however, that I have had a member of the group come to me to explain what they had in mind. But whether a formal application has been made or not, I cannot say. I can certainly ask the Minister of Transport if such a formal request has been made.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable minister, and certainly would be grateful if he would make the inquiry as promised. I would also ask him to ascertain, if such a request has been made, whether or not there has been a response to it.

Senator Olson: I shall take that as notice too.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to pose a question to the genial and Honourable Minister of State for Economic Development, and it is supplementary to the question posed by Senator Donahoe.

First of all, he made a comment to the effect, "If Senator Donahoe had served in cabinet—". Well, he should be brought up to date. If he had served as many years in a cabinet as Senator Donahoe, he would know a little more whereof he speaks. Secondly, he mentioned that this is a game—some sort of a game we are playing, to paraphrase it—and I would reply that we in the Atlantic provinces are not playing any sort of a game. We are interested in the development of the Atlantic provinces. It is not a game. We are asking cogent questions as to what might occur, and we are asking the honourable senator to use his considerable and strong influence in the cabinet to assist us in the Atlantic provinces. Now may I ask him if he is just a messenger boy for the Honourable Pierre De Bané, the minister responsible, or will he assert his extremely strong influence in the cabinet to assist the Atlantic provinces with regard to DREE and other matters? I realize it is difficult for him, coming as he does from a fat cat province like Alberta, to understand the difficult problems we are having in the Atlantic provinces. I am just asking him if he would use his strong influence in cabinet to put forth the views of our problems in the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I want to thank the honourable senator for his use of such complimentary words as "genial" and "strong" and I hope that the days ahead will prove him right. I would like to correct him on one or two points. First of all, I did not intimate in any way, shape or form that Senator Donahoe was not well informed and that he had not been in a cabinet for a long time. In fact it was the other way around; I suggested that he had been in a cabinet long enough to know that no minister could answer the question he asked. I am sure he understood that point, because I could tell by the smile on his face that he did not think he was going to get away with it when he asked the question.

Honourable senators, there is a further point I want to make and that deals with the reference to some fat cats in Alberta who have no understanding of economic difficulties in any other parts of the country. I should tell my honourable friend that in some communities in Alberta we have 25 per cent unemployment right now. If my honourable friend believes that all people in Alberta are wealthy beyond their dreams and that therefore they have no comprehension of what it is to be unemployed for long periods of time, then I am sorry to say that there are people in other parts of Canada who have a great deal to learn. Furthermore, if the implication was that I have no comprehension or understanding, while I don't want to complain here, I do have some memories, living as I do in what is Canada's desert. If Canada has a desert, I live in it. It is the northern tip of the Great North American Desert in southern Alberta. The people in that area have experienced economic difficulties that are as severe as those experienced by anyone anywhere in Canada. So I would not like to hear that argument used as some kind of admonition that we have no appreciation of other people's problems just because we happen to live in Alberta.

I have to tell him in conclusion that the minister running the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is going to continue to be the minister in charge of that department. In case my honourable friend is not aware of how cabinet works and how programs are approved, first of all on policy and then on expenditure, following determination of policy, the minister of that department and of every other department will bring his proposals to the Economic Development Committee of cabinet, where all ministers are equal, and it will be considered along those lines. That is the way it is.

• (1450)

Senator Muir: May I ask a supplementary question? I appreciate the comments made by the honourable minister, and I am sure he knows hardship as well as many of us in this chamber do, but will he assure the house—and I am not asking this facetiously—that he will use his considerable strength in the cabinet to assist a very sincere minister, the Honourable Pierre De Bané, whom I know personally, in regard to DREE and other matters affecting the Atlantic provinces?

I am not casting any reflection on the honourable gentleman—I am sure he must have had his difficulties, as many of us have had—but will he continue to press within the cabinet, along with his colleagues sitting on either side of him, to do what he can to assist the Atlantic provinces?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: The concern of the government of which I am a part to help those who need help most has always been on a much higher level than the concern of any other government that has been in office in Canada. That has been stated over and over again, and it was part of the most recent election campaign, and the level of support we received from a wide range of people from across this country indicates that they believe that that is the policy of this government.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: On a point of privilege, honourable senators; in his recent remarks the honourable minister who has just taken his seat saw fit to allude to an expression which he discerned on my face. He chose to give an explanation as to what he thought was the cause of that expression, and he said that I smiled because of my long experience in cabinet and that I knew from it that I was not to expect an answer from him to my question.

I want to assure him that there was a smile on my face, but it did not stem from that reason. It stemmed from my more recent experience in this chamber during Question Period, having come to realize that we can never expect an answer from the honourable minister.

Senator Asselin: Touché!

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SECURITY OF CANADIAN DIPLOMATS ABROAD

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning an article that appeared in the Toronto Sunday Star, in which it is reported that during the past 18 months there have been 41 attacks on diplomats and break-ins at 12 foreign posts.

What is the Department of External Affairs doing to combat possible criminal or terrorist activities against our diplomats?

Senator Asselin: Nothing!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe the newspaper report may overemphasize the problem which in fact exists with respect to these posts abroad. But it can be said that the department and the government are concerned about the rising incidence of terrorism and violence and criminal attacks around the world.

Fortunately, there have been no terrorist attacks on Canadian missions in recent years. We do not think the frequency of criminal incidents is higher than average for the cities concerned, but I assure honourable senators that the government is not complacent about the status of the situation.

Senator Bosa and others may be interested to know that we began a program of additional security measures over three years ago. To date those additional measures to provide security for Canadian diplomats have cost over $5 million.

Canadian foreign service personnel enjoy a high level of security protection, in our offices and also in residences as required. Additional security measures are continually under consideration.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL ANTI-POVERTY ORGANIZATION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I am sure that the Minister of State for Economic Development will agree that the question is to the point.

I noticed in today's issue of the Ottawa Journal that federal officials and the National Anti-Poverty Organization are meeting today in a desperate bid to save Canada's largest lobby group for the poor from collapse under a massive debt.

May I ask the honourable gentleman if the government will assure the National Anti-Poverty Organization that it will receive the second phase of its federal grant for 1980, which was due on July 2?

Incidentally, compared with the Minister of State for Economic Development, I do have some slight knowledge of what I am speaking about, having been forced to go into the coal mines at the age of 14 under a Liberal government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators know, of course—and I realize Honourable Senator Muir is aware of the fact—that Liberal governments have always had a great concern for the less advantaged in society.

A meeting is being held today with that group. It may be possible to provide information on the outcome of that meeting later today. I know the Honourable Senator Muir joins with us on this side in the hope that some useful settlement can be achieved, but information will be provided as soon as it is available.

NOVA SCOTIA

TRANSFER OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SERVICES TO SYDNEY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I should like to take this opportunity to answer a question Senator Muir posed on May 7 concerning the decentralization of government services to Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Those of us on this side, together with the Minister of Finance, are most sympathetic to the representations made by the honourable senator concerning the movement of government jobs to Sydney which was cancelled by the previous government. The previous government cancelled the movement of those jobs.

Senator Muir: You are right!

Senator Perrault: And I suggest that that was very unfortunate. I am pleased to inform him that the policy is now actively under review by the President of the Treasury Board and it will be discussed soon by cabinet. I will be pleased to inform him of any future announcements as soon as that information is made available to me. There are certain reasons for optimism.

LABOUR

RESTRICTIVE PROVINCIAL EMPLOYMENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 25 the Honourable Senator Muir asked a question concerning the extent of restrictive labour legislation in Canada. A cursory search has been conducted of the legislation relative to the oil and gas industries of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It has been necessary to restrict the research to these employment sectors for two reasons. The first is that the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia legislation primarily deals with petroleum, natural gas and other like natural resources. The second is that, given the time constraint and the available manpower, it would not have been possible to review comprehensively all of the legislation of the aforementioned provinces, and determine the legislative restrictions placed upon the hiring practices of each employment sector affected by such legislation.

As such, the method of research that has been employed is to canvass briefly only those pieces of legislation that pertain to the oil and gas industries of each of the said provinces and to examine cursorily each piece of such legislation and any regulations that are pertinent to it. No examination has been made of any bills presently being tabled by each of the aforementioned provinces.

Accordingly, based upon the research undertaken in order to answer Senator Muir's question, the Province of Quebec appears to be the only province that has enacted legislation similar to that of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

In that regard I should like to refer to the regulation authorizing the Minister of Natural Resources to issue exploration permits to explore for mineral substances in New Quebec, which was Order in Council No. 1497, and which was made pursuant to section 270 of the Mining Act, Statutes of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: What is the date of that?

Senator Perrault: It is S.Q. 1965, Chapter 34.

Senator Flynn: Thank you.

Senator Perrault: The relevant section to consider is section 10. The Quebec regulation differs from that of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia in that it only deals with preferential treatment of local labour and does not extend to the supply of local goods and services, as does the legislation of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

I realize that this reply is rather long, honourable senators, but since it is such an important reply I thought the information should be placed on the record.

In addition to the information I have given so far, I should point out that telephone calls have been placed with the applicable governmental departments of each of the said provinces in order to determine whether any restrictive employment legislation pertaining to the oil and gas industries has been enacted or contemplated or tabled before each pertinent provincial legislature. Negative responses have been received from all of them with the exception of Quebec.

Those verbal responses to the inquiries undertaken on Senator Muir's behalf appear to confirm the research of the matter.

I wish to emphasize that the information I have placed before you is not the result of a comprehensive research into the matter of provincial restrictive employment legislation. To do comprehensive research one would have to canvass all of the enacted and tabled legislation of each province, categorize each piece of such legislation according to the employment sector which it affects, and then conduct an in-depth review of each such legislation, to determine the legislative restrictions placed upon the hiring practices of the employment sector affected by such legislation.

● (1500)

That is the research which the department has been able to do since June 25.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. May I express my sincere thanks to the Leader of the Government for his reply regarding decentralization. It is a matter which has occupied the attention of the present Minister of Finance, Senator Graham and myself for a number of years. I hope that within a few weeks we will have an official announcement that this is going forward.

With regard to the Leader of the Government's reply to the questions that I posed previously, I do not think they were limited to gas and oil exploration. Is it not correct that in the construction industry the residents of Ontario are not allowed to work in the province of Quebec, but residents of Quebec are allowed to work in the province of Ontario on construction. I realize that it is a rather touchy problem, but can he comment on the situation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe that that question should be taken as notice. I am aware of certain reports in that direction, but I would like to obtain up-to-date definitive information for the honourable senator.

ENERGY

LIQUEFIED NATURAL GAS CONVERSION SITES IN EASTERN CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to two questions asked by Senator Phillips on June 26 relating to the sale of liquefied natural gas from Canada's north into markets on the Atlantic seaboard. Senator Phillips asked why the Saint John site is no longer under consideration as a terminal for LNG tanker shipments from the Arctic Islands.

[Senator Perrault.]

I am pleased to respond by saying that the Saint John site is still very much under consideration, as is also Canso Strait and sites in Quebec. No decision has been taken up to this time.

Further to Senator Phillips' interest in this matter as to whether Petro-Canada plans to have the necessary liquefied natural gas tankers constructed in Canada, this matter is still under review by the sponsors of the Arctic pilot project.

In response to a question by the Honourable Ernest C. Manning, as to market arrangements for Arctic Islands gas, I would make the following comment. Senator Manning, in particular, was interested in knowing whether the gas would be used primarily for export and, if so, whether this might be arranged through offsets of western gas for delivery in American markets while the Arctic LNG was used in eastern Canada.

Honourable senators, I would first like to say that the Arctic pilot project is not tied to the concepts of prebuilding in relation to the Alaska highway gas pipeline. However, it is proposed to export the Arctic LNG by displacement. By this I mean that the Arctic gas would be delivered to eastern Canada and Alberta gas would be exported to U.S. customers.

At this point in time, no decision has been made on what facilities would be used to export the Alberta gas. If prebuild proceeds, those facilities could be used, as could pipeline facilities already in existence.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. With reference to the question I asked him yesterday—which he reasonably took as notice—about employment in shipyards in the Atlantic area, will he be able to furnish an answer in the next day or two?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators, hopefully by Friday, which many are hoping will be the last day of sitting before the summer recess. I will not make any predictions, but I have heard the hope expressed in one or two places that we will try to put together some kind of compilation of those facts as best we can obtain them.

I can tell the honourable senator that we have quite a large amount of background data. We need to check the information with certain people, but they have not been available since the question was asked.

HUMAN RIGHTS

STATUS OF NATIVE WOMEN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer regarding the status of women, a question asked by Senator Bielish on July 10.

Senator Bielish asked:

> —would the Leader of the Government bring to the Senate a progress report on discussions which the government is having with native people to arrive at a new policy on the question of human rights for native women?

In reply, the minister and his senior officials have met with Indian representatives on a number of occasions during the past year to discuss this problem. These have included meetings with Indian Rights for Indian Women, the B.C. Native Women's Society, the Indian Homemakers of B.C., as well as with Indian associations from Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and the National Indian Brotherhood. Position papers for some of these organizations have been received and reviewed, and have influenced the development of corresponding papers and options within the department.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Honourable John C. Munro, is conducting a series of meetings this summer with Indian chiefs and associations across the country. It is hoped that as a result of these meetings, the minister will be able to present to the House of Commons in the fall a proposed bill which will enable Indian governments to take over the administration of affairs within their own communities, in ways and within a time frame of their own choosing. Included within this legislation could be provisions which would deal effectively with the question raised by the honourable senator.

However, as the Prime Minister pointed out on July 7, 1980, in the other place, the government wishes to avoid imposing solutions to this problem which would ride roughshod over Indian traditions. If no large degree of agreement can be reached with Indian leaders on this question within a reasonable time frame, the government would not exclude taking action to bring in satisfactory recommendations.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Martial Asselin: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether we can expect to receive answers to the questions asked two weeks ago and also yesterday before we commence the summer recess?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): With respect to the proposed date for the recess?

Senator Asselin: No. Can we expect to receive answers to questions that have been asked within the past two weeks?

Senator Perrault: Every effort is being made to provide as many replies as possible before the summer recess. The research people have been working diligently in an endeavour to gather all of the information. The honourable senator will be aware that some of the questions are very complicated, but it is hoped that a good deal of information can be provided before the end of the week.

Senator Asselin: That is because we have a good opposition team.

Senator Perrault: That is right. There is nothing wrong with that.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to the attention of honourable senators an interesting meeting of the National Finance Committee tomorrow. The witnesses will be Mr. S. R. Blair, who is the President and Chief Executive Officer of Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company, and Mr. C. William Daniel, who is the President and Chief Executive Officer of Shell Canada.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Louis de G. Giguère moved the third reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1980-81

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for second reading of Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am grateful for the good will of some honourable senators who are willing to listen to a few disjointed remarks on Bill C-30 on such a humid afternoon at the tail end of this part of the session. One would think that with a bill as short as this, the speech could follow suit. I make no promises in that respect, because while it consists of one page alone, and ostensibly all it does, if that is not enough, is to authorize the government to borrow $12 billion, it does encompass and include some important issues of public finance.

• (1510)

This request underlines what I think is one of the basic principles of the parliamentary system; that is, that when the executive asks Parliament for money, as it does in this bill, it is duty bound, I submit, to justify its request on the basis of the financial policies on which the bill rests. Parliament, also, is duty bound to scrutinize with care the explanations that it receives.

In light of that position honourable senators will understand how much I support the complaint made last night by my colleague Senator Doody with respect to the fact that we are being asked to debate this bill in the absence of a budget. With his typical perspicacity Senator Doody went to the heart of the matter with respect to the debate on this bill, namely, that it is exceedingly difficult to discuss this borrowing proposal in rational and cogent terms without being able to relate it to the budget of the country. We have, of course, been denied a budget.

Even if a budget is denied, it is difficult to discuss the bill unless, in presenting it, the government gives Parliament and the people some idea of the financial policies which gave rise to it, and upon which it is based. Yet the debates in the other place show that the government gave scant recognition, if any, to what I think is an obligation to justify the policy which gives rise to the bill.

Obviously, when it was discussed in the other place, there was an opportunity for the government to take Parliament and the public into its confidence, and to explain the real impact of the debt policy embodied in this bill and relate it to the welfare of Canadians. In my opinion, unfortunately, the Minister of Finance saw fit to dispose of this bill, on its introduction, in 68 lines of Hansard, which amounts to scarcely 600 words. I must say, in reference to the sponsor of the bill in the Senate, Senator Langlois, that he treated us to a little better discourse in his presentation than was offered in the other house. There was further explanation of a technical nature offered later, both in the Commons and in the committee, but no analysis was offered of, and no real justification was provided for, the economic policy that lies behind this bill.

That is a pity, because when we have a situation in which, after six months of a new government, we still have no budget; when there has been no serious discussion, that I am aware of at all, of the government's fiscal or economic policies, either in this house or the other, Bill C-30 provided a window through which a beam of light might have been allowed to fall upon the murky interior of the government's fiscal and economic intentions. I think that is a pity, because the country has a right to expect that the government would use this opportunity to provide some of the information which has been withheld since they refuse to present a budget. They could have cleared away some of the uncertainty and hesitation that surround federal economic policy these days, and give a clear signal to the public as to what their policy is intended to be with respect to inflation versus unemployment, or with respect to taxes versus a deficit, or with respect to the fight against inflation and a public debt policy, all of which, I suggest, are encompassed in the matter contained in this bill.

I think at the very minimum they might have given us their views on the size of the borrowing, because after all, $12 billion, as far as I am aware, is the largest sum that any government in Canada has ever sought to borrow in one bill. Indeed, the size of the borrowing clearly reflects the size of the deficit, and when you come to think of it they are probably two sides of the one coin. Borrowing the $12 billion arises from a deficit of $14 billion—sums that are perhaps almost too huge to be grasped by ordinary folk like me.

The economy closest to ours is, of course, the American one; and to equal ours in proportional terms the United States deficit would have to be $140 billion, and to equal what is proposed in this bill, the borrowing authority of the American administration would have to be $120 billion. I think no one would disagree that if the United States deficit, or the United States borrowing requirement, ever approached these sums the economy of the world would be shaken.

I suggest that it is safe to say that Bill C-30 indicates an enormous deficit for a country of the size of ours, and an enormous demand on the Canadian sources of credit. In all probability it will have a significant effect on inflation in this country.

We have, however, to approach the basic question about the deficit and the size of the deficit. Does it really matter? I, for one, would like to know what the government thinks about it. I know what the Governor of the Bank of Canada thinks about it. I think it is fair to say that he thinks the deficit does matter. He was before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and in a typically restrained and careful manner gave to me a clear warning. He first indicated the nature of the long term and disastrous inflationary trend that we are struggling with in this country, and in respect of that said:

> The role of the federal government is clearly of crucial importance.

He followed that up in the course of the discussion with the statement:

> I believe the people do associate large deficits with inflation. When they see deficits increasing more and more, that tends to feed inflationary expectations.

Of course, we know that is true. In fact, the Consumers Association of Canada the other day, in a survey of their own, identified the fact that 60 per cent of Canadians blamed the deficit for inflation. I would like to add in this connection that government borrowings are the flip side of the government deficits.

I suggest that to some of us, at any rate, the Governor of the Bank of Canada is the only federal authority in sight who is actually proposing and making economic policy in this country today. If I understood him correctly, he expressed the wish that the government also would give a clear signal to the public of this country in the areas for which it is responsible, with respect to its views, and to the future conduct of economic and financial affairs. He called for a signal that the government would no longer feed inflation with increasing deficits and higher borrowings. In connection with this deficit he said, "Let us keep it from increasing, if we can, at a minimum." What does the government think of Governor Bouey's analysis of this situation? The deficit is still increasing, our borrowing requirements still rise, and they will continue to rise.

Before the Senate committee the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Ian Stewart, seemed to think that the current deficit was not contributing to inflation. Is that the government's view today?

Senator Benidickson: Which committee?

Senator Roblin: The National Finance Committee, senator.

In a press conference on April 24, the Prime Minister had some words to say—and this is relevant to the line I am pursuing—which, in my opinion, clearly downgraded deficits as a national problem. I would like to read his words to the chamber.

[Translation]

> We have no hang-ups about the deficit, like the Tories or the Clark government, though we feel that in the long run we must attempt to reduce it. But I have already stated emphatically, and I say it again today, that we will not reduce the deficit by creating more unemployment and hardship for the Canadian people. Creating jobs is more important than, once again, being obsessed by the level of the deficit.

● (1520)

[English]

This means to me that, for him, the problem of unemployment comes before the problems of the deficit and inflation.

Deficits and government borrowings are not unrelieved evils—at least, in my opinion, they are not. There certainly may be times when governments should run deficits and when they should borrow money. Those are times of recession; those are times of rising unemployment; those are times of a faltering economy; and those are times like today. The point I put to the Senate is: In 1980, how much leeway do we have? How much room do we have for a bigger deficit and higher borrowings to help the unemployed as the Prime Minister seems to indicate he wants to do?

If in more prosperous times the government had been prudent and run a surplus now and then, and reduced the deficit a little, the government would have leeway and reserves of financial power to help the unemployed and to deal with the recession. However, in my opinion, the government did not do that. It squandered its opportunities in the good times and, as a result today I submit that there is precious little fiscal economic elbow room available to the federal government of this country to do its duty to the unemployed and towards the stimulation of the economy which we would like to see today.

It has no one to blame but itself for boxing itself into this corner. Our deficits have climbed steadily to reach today's record. This did not happen overnight. Our borrowings have climbed steadily to reach the records that are enshrined in this bill.

While this was going on in the past few years, my impression is that the government was telling the people that they could have free lunch today, but it avoided telling them that they would have to pay for it tomorrow. Instead of being able to help unemployment and reinforce the economy, the government has, in my opinion, to a large extent, disarmed itself. It has disarmed itself and rendered itself almost helpless because past policies have lacked the prudence and foresight that we should all expect our government to observe.

The size of the deficit in 1980 has seriously impaired the ability of the federal administration to deal with the pressing economic policies of this country.

How will the government make good on the Prime Minister's statement on April 24 last which I read—"People before deficits"? Does the government intend to run a bigger deficit? That is something I would like to know before I vote for this bill. Will there be a bigger borrowing bill next time? I strongly suggest that if nothing is done, that might well happen. Are there going to be higher taxes in this country in order to support the policy of people before the deficit or in order to support the policy of running the deficit at the rate that it is at now?

I would suggest that before we grant the powers asked for in Bill C-30, Parliament and, what is more important, the people of the country ought to have more information. We are entitled to have something more than these hand-to-mouth economic and financial policies which have been the hallmark of this administration since the present government resumed office.

I say again that, when the executive comes to Parliament with a request for money, it is one of the oldest and most elementary rules of our system that it justifies its monetary policy. The questions which I pose, and which I heard posed last night by my colleague, Senator Doody, deserve to be answered. The public has a right to know, and the government has a duty to explain.

Consider the circumstances. To service the current debt interest, excluding repayments, will cost 22½ cents out of every dollar raised by federal taxes. In the committee, the Minister of Finance stated that this proportion of 22½ cents in the dollar did not alarm him. I think he is a pretty imperturbable fellow because there are some people in this country who will be decidedly alarmed by this situation.

How much higher than 22½ cents on the tax dollar can this interest burden go? My colleague, Senator Doody, fancifully suggested last night that it could go as high as 100 per cent. Fanciful or not, 22½ cents on the tax dollar collected is not fanciful; it is alarming. Yet we have no indication whatsoever that this represents the top of the graph; it will continue to climb.

Why do we require this $12 billion? What will it pay for? I do not know, but I can give a pretty good guess that a large portion of it, $3½-$4 billion, is going to be required to pay the oil subsidy that is in vogue in this country today, and that is a very current expense. To pay the oil subsidy, $3½-$4 billion of this borrowing that is before us will be required. At an interest rate of 11 per cent—and that is pretty good if you are able to get it on Monday or whenever the new borrowing bills are passed—we are going to spend $350 million to $400 million on interest.

Next year, when that interest comes due, where will we get the money from? I can suggest the answer based on the precedent of the last few years, namely, "We are going to borrow it. We are going to raise the principal this year; we are going to borrow for the interest next year." The pyramiding will go on. One asks oneself: Where is the end of this kind of situation in respect to our public debt? We will keep on borrowing next year the very money that we need to pay the interest on the money we borrow this year, and for current expenses of the government at that.

Between 1975 and 1979 the figures I have seen indicate that the government has borrowed $30 billion for current expenditures—not for public investment but for current expenses like the oil subsidy to which I have referred. We are going to borrow the money to pay the interest on that sum. That is why we will be paying 22½ cents out of each dollar collected in order to support the interest on the public debt.

I ask the house to consider what the pressure is going to be on the money markets with this kind of borrowing requirement hanging over the financial system of our country, not this year alone, but on the basis of the present information, next year and, indeed, beyond that. We will be borrowing $1 billion a month, and that pressure is bound to have some effect on the rate of interest. It will inevitably be higher than it would be otherwise.

Not only will the government be paying a higher rate of interest, but so will everyone else who wants to borrow in the public market. Perhaps the private sector will be crowded out. Some say that it is not crowded out today. We had testimony in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance from Mr. Stewart that the public sector was not crowding out the private sector today. I say to members of this house, if that is not the case now, it assuredly will be the case because next year we will be borrowing even more than we are today. Next year, if this economy of ours is to make a recovery, the private sector will want to borrow money too, and I think the danger of crowding that out of the money market can by no means be dismissed as easily or as lightly as it seems to me it has been dismissed by those who think about the matter at the present time.

There is a very famous series of sketches by a man called Hogarth. He drew these pictures in the latter half of the eighteenth century to indicate what happens to a man, profligate and irresponsible, let loose in the city of London to do what he likes. He called that series of pictures A Rake's Progress. Can anyone think of a better description of the progression that we have seen in connection with the financial management of our Canadian affairs in these last few years than that title of Hogarth's—a rake's progress if ever there was one?

Unfortunately, Bill C-30 does not represent some isolated economic necessity for which we are asked to dig down into our pockets. It is the climax of years of constantly increasing deficits and borrowing and thus, in my opinion, our federal financial powers are being constrained to the extent that today we do not have the elbow room in the federal public fiscal sector to reinforce an ailing economy in the way we would like to do or to help the unemployed in this country who need our help.

A wise policy can contemplate deficits and borrowings to help the unemployed during a recession if you have the financial capacity to do so. In conjunction with this, we all know that what we need in this country is not only a wise public debt policy, but lower taxation, more room in the capital market for the private sector, and a general stimulus of the economy which, I believe, is beyond the power of the government to provide at the present time in view of the way they have clipped their own wings in the sphere of financial and economic management.

• (1530)

What we need most of all, if we were willing to overlook all of that and say, "That is in the past; we cannot do much about it. We have to swallow it and get on with things as best we can"—what the country needs most of all is a clear signal by this administration as to what its priorities are now and how it intends to implement them. Is inflation still to be the priority on our list of objectives? Is it to be "wrestled to the ground" once again, or are there other policies that will have to be considered along with it? Is free lunch still recognized to be the order of the day, and to blazes with the consequences tomorrow? That is what Governor Bouey, in my mind, called for in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance—a clear expression, a clear signal from the administration of this country as to the direction they wish to go and some solid evidence that they are resolved in spite of the difficulties to carry through along that line.

Honourable senators, I am not a prophet and I am not the son of a prophet, but if things go the way they are, I think there are one or two things that we can very reasonably expect. We can expect to see more inflation. We can expect to see more unemployment. We can expect to see more deficit. We can expect to see more high taxes.

An Hon. Senator: Gloom and doom.

Senator Roblin: I am delighted to have this intervention from both the Leader of the Government and my honourable and very distinguished friend who sits opposite. Gloom and doom, they say. I suggest to them that is not the case. What I am suggesting to this house or placing before this house now is an analysis that has some basis on fact and realism. It can be debated. I do not claim that what I say is one hundred per cent correct, but there is a basis of fact, and as long as people on the other side who are charged with responsibility keep saying "gloom and doom" to any objective analysis of the problems in which we are engaged, so much longer will we wallow in the slough that we are in at the present time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: They might save their comments for a more suitable occasion.

In short, we are hardly in the best of all possible worlds. I do not despair. How can one despair?

Some Hon. Senators: Hurray.

Senator Roblin: I despair for my honourable friend, but I don't despair for the country. We have had my honourable friend and the likes of him running the country for some time, and I do not think it is much of a record upon which I would like to make any claim. But I do not despair in the capacity of our present rulers to decide that they need to strike out on a new course. I do not despair.

I think that the force of events will probably be a more instructive and eloquent leader in this way than any words of mine are likely to be, but I don't despair for either the country or the ability of its leaders to do something about it. I would like to see some evidence that would justify the optimism that I have insofar as the policies of the present government are concerned.

What they have to do is well known to them. They know they have to reduce inflation, they know they have to enhance productivity in this country, and they know they have to reduce the dependence of Canadians on foreign energy sources.

If they would take the opportunity of this bill, or any reasonable opportunity in the near future, to express their views on these matters, show us how they intend to lead us out of the difficulties that we are in, then whether I am in the opposition or the government I would be happy to see Canada advancing on a more constructive course than the one we are on at the present time.

I think that Bill C-30 gave the government the opportunity to give the country the firm signal that I have been asking for. I hope they will give us some evidence in the near future that they are, at last, alert to the danger in which we find ourselves; that they will give us some idea that they know where safety is to be found; and produce some evidence of their resolution to achieve it. But, alas, up to the present time the government has not even put the telescope to the blind eye, so heaven only knows what they are looking at today.

I suggest that the nation itself—outside the charmed circle of Ottawa—continues to grope with no lead and no policy. I think the country deserves a better situation than we have at that time. Under these circumstances, I find it very difficult to support this legislation.

Senator Flynn: Before Senator Langlois closes the debate, I would like him to tell us whether he wants to refer this bill to committee.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to open my remarks by expressing my thanks to both my colleagues, Senator Roblin and Senator Doody, for their expression of satisfaction with my efforts in introducing this bill in this house yesterday. It would seem I did it in an acceptable manner.

Senator Asselin: Very brave; very courageous.

Senator Langlois: If I did what they called an acceptable job, it is because I have done quite a bit of research which I hope my honourable friends would have the opportunity to carry on themselves.

First, I went to the very introduction of this bill in the other place, and I read the address of the Minister of Finance on April 21, 1980. I wish to quote some excerpts from this address, and in doing so would remind honourable senators that the minister drew a parallel between his mini budget and the budget that was introduced on December 11, 1979, by the previous government.

As honourable senators will recall, the previous government was elected in May 1979, and we had to wait until December 11 for a budget.

Senator Frith: Shame.

Senator Langlois: And the only reason then offered, if my memory serves me well, was that this was due to the delay in the negotiations of the oil price with the producing Canadian provinces. I venture to suggest to my honourable colleagues opposite that the same situation obtains today. We are still in the midst of negotiations on the same oil price, and, if this was a fair excuse for the previous government to delay their budget, the same excuse exists today.

Senator Perrault: You can call your friends in Alberta and get it settled.

Senator Langlois: I do not want to get into a political debate on this very serious question, but I am trying to refresh the memory of my honourable friends opposite.

In his address on April 21, the Minister of Finance had also this to say, and I quote from page 244 of House of Commons Debates:

> Revenues are lower than in the December forecast by some $300 million. The various increases in that budget which were not put into effect would have boosted revenues by close to $600 million. But corporation income tax revenues grew somewhat faster than expected in December and provided a partial offset. The projections for 1980-81 are based on economic assumptions for 1980 to which I shall refer shortly.
>
> Revenues are projected to increase by 13 per cent after taking into account all the tax measures which I have just reintroduced.

● (1540)

On the same day the minister tabled in the House background notes to the notices of ways and means motions reintroduced from the December 11, 1979 budget. This is the document to which I referred yesterday when I said that a projection of the government's budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements for 1980-81 had been tabled. When I said that, I was referring to those background notes.

The minister went on to state:

> The expenditure projection includes the $35 per month increase in the guaranteed income supplement to needy old age pensioners.
> On the basis of these assumptions, total outlays in 1980-81 are projected to increase by 13.7 per cent to $60.4 billion. This high projected growth in expenditures in 1980-81 is largely accounted for by the very high growth in the cost of two major existing expenditure programs, public debt charges and oil import compensation.

Senator Perrault: And aid to drought-stricken Manitoba.

Senator Langlois: The minister went on to state:

> Financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, are projected to be $11.7 billion in 1980-81. This represents an increase of more than $1 billion over 1979-80 and is substantially higher than the $8.2 billion forecast in the December, 1979, budget. By far the largest factor in the difference vis-à-vis the December budget is the absence of the massive increase in the gasoline excise tax.

I also read the proceedings of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I should like to mention to my honourable friends opposite the extensive documentation which was tabled before that committee by the Minister of Finance. Table I gave a history of borrowing authority bills in the other place. The Minister of Finance mentioned that borrowing authority used to be sought through an additional clause in supply bills, but that in 1975 this practice was changed following a decision made by the Speaker of the other place that borrowing authorities should be sought in separate bills because, when they were added to a supply bill, it prevented the house, as a whole, from discussing the borrowing authority. Since 1975, the practice has been to present a special bill for borrowing authority with one day's debate provided for in the rules of the other place.

Senator Flynn: We raised the same objection in this place.

Senator Langlois: I agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that the same objection was raised in this place.

Table II, which was filed by the Minister of Finance, represents the present status of the borrowing authority.

Table III shows the sources of financing for 1976-77, 1978-79 and 1979-80. Table IV shows the structure of Canada's outstanding debt for 1977-78, 1979-80, and up to June 18, 1980 with percentages of sources of borrowing, such as treasury bills, marketable bonds and Canada Savings Bonds. Table V shows the debt program for the first quarter of the fiscal year—that is, the first quarter of 1980—treasury bills, marketable bonds and the redemptions of Canada Savings Bonds once again.

Table No. VI is an effort to show the details of recent Government of Canada bonds issues, the retirement, the net, the final maturity date, as well as the amounts, the coupon rates, the issue price and the yield at maturity.

This is an important document, and if Senator Doody had read this document yesterday I do not think he would have asked as many questions as he did.

It is clearly indicated in these tables that borrowing in foreign currency is quite an important factor in reducing Canada's borrowing expenditures. I should like to cite the part of that table dealing with borrowing in yen. For example, the first borrowing made was on March 8, 1979. That was the date of the delivery. The amount was 700 million SF. The Canadian equivalent was $493 million. The coupon rate was 2⅜ per cent. The maturity was March 1980-82. This was a bank loan. This was followed by a private loan on March 14, 1979, in the amount of 500 million SF. The Canadian equivalent was $350 million. The rate was 3 per cent and the maturity date was March 14, 1985.

This was followed by a public issue on March 20, 1979, in the amount of 300 million SF. The Canadian equivalent was $208 million. The rate was 3⅝ per cent, and the maturity date was March 20, 1989. Those were pretty low rates, and my honourable friends would have to agree with that. There was a great advantage to Canada in going to that market for additional borrowing.

Senator Doody: Is that the end?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

Senator Doody: Is that Swiss francs or Japanese yen?

Senator Langlois: Swiss francs.

I understand that my friend was trying to get some information on the rate that should be payable if we went on foreign markets for our borrowings, so I quoted this because I think it is a good answer to his question of yesterday.

Senator Doody: What was the term?

Senator Langlois: This information was supplied to the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on June 26, 1980.

Senator Asselin: What was the term?

Senator Doody: What was the term? Was it seven years, eight years, or what?

Senator Langlois: I have given you the delivery date and the maturity date. The term is there. I have given the same for the three categories. If my honourable friend wants more information, I will let him have this document, because it is a public document, after all.

Senator Walker: Why don't you table it?

Senator Langlois: Another document which was tabled in the committee of the other place set forth the details on treasury bills and Canada Savings Bonds outstanding by series. There is some interesting detail in this paper on foreign loans undertaken since 1978. The last borrowing was on March 20, 1979, and honourable senators will notice that the interest rate, as I just mentioned, on these borrowings was quite low, and, therefore, it was quite advantageous to Canada to make those borrowings.

Senator Doody also asked a further question relating to the expenditures covered by the amount of $12 billion sought by the borrowing authority bill. Well, this was given quite clearly by the Minister of Finance in the first instance in the other place on April 21, and by myself yesterday when I repeated in substance the statement the minister had made on that occasion. This information is to the effect that the $12 billion of borrowing authority is to cover financial requirements excluding foreign exchange transactions projected at $11.7 billion in 1980-81. This represents an increase of more than $1 billion over 1979-80, and is substantially higher than the $8.2 billion forecast in the December, 1979 budget. Of course, if honourable senators wished to refer to the background paper to the notices of ways and means motions reintroducing the December 11, 1979, budget, they would have all the information sought by this question yesterday.

I know that Senator Doody and Senator Roblin this afternoon were criticizing the fact that we were asked to pass this borrowing authority bill without a budget. There was a very long, protracted debate in the other place on the same question, and I think the minister in his remarks of April 21, 1980, answered this question. I would like my honourable friends to take the trouble to read his address, and I am sure that if they did so they would have their minds set at rest once and for all.

The Leader of the Opposition asked me if I would be in favour of having this bill referred to a committee. I do not mind which committee it is referred to; possibly it should go to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. But I wish to draw the attention of the house to what I said yesterday on second reading when I mentioned that the government intended to launch a borrowing campaign early in August. I think I gave the date as August 1. I also mentioned that the general practice for the launching of such a borrowing campaign at this time of the year is to make a first announcement around July 10 or July 15. We have passed both those dates. But otherwise I have no objection to referral to a committee. I am in the hands of the Senate in this respect, and I would have no objection to having this bill sent to a committee after second reading, if there was some assurance that we could get it back to this house sometime tomorrow, probably tomorrow morning if we sit in the morning. If such an assurance is given, I am quite willing to so move after second reading is passed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in order to reply to the question raised by Senator Langlois, I can give him the assurance on behalf of the opposition that if the bill is returned by tomorrow sometime, it can then receive third reading and royal assent tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think we are in any procedural difficulty, because the officials are here to meet with the committee this afternoon. I might add that I fully accept the undertaking by the Leader of the Opposition that if the bill is returned from committee sometime tomorrow, it can then receive third reading and royal assent tomorrow. But the problem—I do not think it is a serious one—is that the bill must have third reading tomorrow.

I have discussed a solution with my honourable friend. If the bill receives second reading today with the Senate ordering third reading at the next sitting, namely tomorrow, then we will not need unanimous consent tomorrow. But an undertaking by the Leader of the Opposition, an undertaking by the Leader of the Government, an undertaking by 103 senators, is not unanimous consent, and that is what is required by the rules. It is not a question of undertakings, but a question of unanimous consent.

Senator Flynn: It would be highly irregular, because we are fewer than 103 senators.

Senator Frith: Well, whatever the number is, the only absolutely iron-clad guarantee would be something signed by each and every senator, which, of course, is not possible. But there is a solution. It is that the Senate do now order that the bill receive third reading by not later than, say, 11.30 a.m. or 12 noon tomorrow, July 17, 1980, as has been discussed. If the Senate passes such an order, the committee could proceed with its study this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: At what time?

Senator Frith: As soon as possible. The committee could be given power to sit while the Senate is sitting, and the committee could commence within 10 minutes, if necessary. So if I can have those two routine matters accepted by the Senate, namely, that we sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. and that Bill C-30 will receive third reading by no later than tomorrow morning—and there is a precedent for this incidentally—then we can proceed with the committee study of the bill as requested this afternoon. I therefore ask for such an order.

Senator Flynn: It cannot be done at this time, and I have very grave doubts as to the regularity of the procedure. What I think we could do is to give second reading to the bill and refer it to committee. Then the bill could be reported later today, let us say before 6 o'clock, and be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow. Even if we were to follow the suggestion of the deputy leader, if there was a filibuster on third reading tomorrow, nothing could be done about it. So I think you might as well take my word for it and follow the advice I am giving you.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if what we are hearing is an undertaking that this bill will be reported this afternoon—

Senator Flynn: The committee is master of its own deliberations, but I am quite sure the bill will be reported. I think about an hour would be sufficient to study it in committee.

Senator Frith: That is what I understand. If what I am hearing is an undertaking from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and we know we can get the same undertaking—

Senator Flynn: Former Leader of the Government.

Senator Frith: Yes, the former Leader of the Government in the Senate—and he will no doubt have noticed the extent to which we are prepared to go to act as if he were still the Leader of the Government—then, all we need, in order to meet our exigencies, which is the signing of cabinet approval by shortly after noon tomorrow, is an undertaking that we have leave to sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. We need that according to the rules.

Senator Flynn: Let us deal with that matter when it comes. Let us give the bill second reading, and proceed one step at a time.

Senator Walker: Don't overplay your hand.

Senator Frith: I appreciate that counsel from one of the best card players in the world. But I shall have to try to play my own hand the way I hold it. I take it that the committee is in a position to sit immediately if we give it leave to sit while the Senate is sitting.

• (1600)

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, as chairman of the committee it is my intention that, as soon as the bill is given second reading and is referred to committee, I will move with leave that the committee have power to sit while the Senate is sitting both today and tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Very good.

Senator Everett: The meeting tomorrow will be for the examination of government policy and regional disparities, with Messrs. Blair and Daniel as witnesses.

Senator Frith: The undertaking that has been given is on the basis that the bill will be reported back from committee this afternoon.

Senator Everett: I don't think the Deputy Leader of the Government has any worry on that score. I will guarantee it.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, that this bill be now read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: On division.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I hope that it is being recorded that the bill is being given second reading on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and tomorrow, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Frith.]

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, if I may have the indulgence of the house, I understand that room 356-S is available, and as soon as we get set up we will be in touch with honourable senators. I understand that the witness is Mr. S. J. Handfield-Jones, Assistant Deputy Minister, Fiscal Policy and Economic Analysis Branch of the Department of Finance.

Senator Flynn: I thought that you would be able to get the parliamentary secretary or Mr. Bussières.

Senator Frith: We can't get Mr. Bussières, because he is otherwise engaged. We will get the parliamentary secretary. The official who will be here has precisely the same name, and I assume it is the same person that Senator Roblin indicated he would like to hear.

Senator Roblin: All I said is that he was the man who appeared in committee of the other house, along with the deputy minister. I did not really intend to endorse or not endorse him. I shall wait and see.

Senator Frith: I did not suggest that there was any endorsement. I asked whom we could get, and that was the name you mentioned.

Senator Roblin: I admit that is true.

Senator Everett: In any event, I gather that we can get the parliamentary secretary.

Senator Frith: My advice is that we can.

Senator Everett: Then I suggest we do so. The meeting may have to be held in room 260-N rather than 356-S, but I will let honourable senators know.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the Order:

> Second reading of the Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand until later this day.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

FORT NELSON INDIAN RESERVE MINERALS REVENUE SHARING BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-26, to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve.

He said: Honourable senators, the long title of Bill C-26 may help to explain the purpose of the bill. It reads:

> An Act to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve.

My introduction of this bill will cover four headings: First, the purpose of the bill; secondly, some explanatory facts; thirdly, the agreement—I will not read the whole of the agreement—the principle contained in the agreement; and, fourthly, how the agreement will apply.

The purpose of the Fort Nelson agreement is to allow the Fort Nelson band to share with the Province of British Columbia revenues from resources underlying their reserve lands. If honourable senators will refer to the bill, they will see that it is quite short, having only eight clauses: The short title; the interpretation, with reference particularly to the agreement and the minister; the agreement, which says that the agreement is approved and declared to have the force of law; a provision for inconsistency, in clause 4; the power to make regulations, in clause 5; the power to amend, in clauses 6 and 7; and commencement on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

The background facts are as follows: Indian reserve lands were set aside for the Fort Nelson band in 1961. At that time the mineral rights underlying these lands had already been alienated by the province—alienated not in the sense of what we call western alienation, but in the legal sense. It was therefore not possible to transfer them to the band. I suppose I ought to explain that "alienated" in that sense would mean, in effect, transferred—rights given away and the title given away. It was therefore not possible to transfer them to the band. In almost all other cases it had been the practice of the Province of British Columbia to transfer mineral rights along with surface rights to Indian bands in British Columbia when setting aside the land for reserves. The normal procedure, as has been said, was to take the mineral rights and transfer them to the band when other transfers were being made of rights with reference to the land; but they failed to do that in this case.

The Fort Nelson band requested the support of the federal government following that 1961 transfer in attempting to gain ownership of the mineral rights underlying their reserves from the provinces.

The Government of Canada pressed the province for recognition of the band's right to share in the revenues accruing from resources beneath the reserves. The province did not agree to negotiate with the band for those rights until the year 1976. The result of those negotiations is the agreement and the proposed legislation.

● (1610)

That concludes part two of my submission to you, honourable senators, the first part being the purpose of the bill and an explanation, and the second part being the facts and the background.

The Fort Nelson Agreement, which was signed on January 7 of this year between the Government of Canada, on the band's behalf, and the Province of British Columbia, provides for equal revenue-sharing between the band and the province. Honourable senators will therefore recognize that it is essentially an agreement between the band and the province, with the Government of Canada signing on behalf of the band. This equal-sharing applies to all net profits and gross revenues accruing to the province from the exploration and exploitation of minerals, petroleum and natural gas underlying the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve.

This is a brief reprieve since normally the band would keep those. In this case, those rights have been given up so there was an agreement that the province would share the revenue with the band. That is the intention of the agreement. British Columbia says that it will now share the revenue since the band had given away the rights.

This policy of equal-sharing was established in 1943 by Canada and the province, by the signing of the British Columbia Indian Reserves Mineral Resources Agreement. This agreement covered most minerals, but was silent with respect to coal, petroleum and natural gas. The Governments of Canada and British Columbia are required respectively to recommend this legislation to Parliament and the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia, giving effect and declaring valid the provisions of the agreement; and both have done so. It has been done in British Columbia; it has been done here, and we are in the process of the second or third step, namely, the submission to this chamber.

I move now to the fourth branch which is the application of the agreement.

The present concern of the band and the province is equal-sharing from two natural gas fields. The Clarke Lake Field is 7.44 per cent beneath reserve lands and began production in 1961 from off-reverve wells. The Rogers Field is wholly within the 23,000-acre reserve and began production in 1977. The band was required, pursuant to the Indian Act, to surrender all rights in their reserve land which were necessary to implement the provisions of the agreement. They indicated an overwhelming majority in favour of the agreement on February 18, 1980, at a referendum meeting.

An initial payment by the province in the amount of $12 million has been deposited in an account for the band, and future revenues should amount to approximately $50 million. These monies will be held in this special account for the use and benefit of the band until the total process, including passage of this legislation, is completed. If the legislation is not passed within two years from the date of execution of the agreement, all monies in the account will be transferred to the Province of British Columbia, and the agreement shall be declared null and void, and we would be back, to use the vernacular, to square one.

The funds available to the Fort Nelson Band under the terms of this agreement will enable them to elevate the living standards of their community. With two-thirds of the band's population being under the age of 21, acceptance of this legislation by the Senate will provide the necessary resources to improve the life of these young people in that community, not only now but in future years as well.

This legislation, honourable senators, represents a significant opportunity for the Governments of Canada and British Columbia to undertake measures in support of the social and economic development of the Fort Nelson Band. Of the 573 Indian bands across Canada, relatively few have the good fortune or the opportunity to benefit directly from the development of resources on their reserves. The Indian Conditions Report which was released to the public last month serves to underscore the need to provide Indian bands with increased financial resources to improve social and economic conditions in their communities.

I commend passage of this bill to honourable senators for the reasons expounded in my remarks.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question in regard to this legislation. I understand that an agreement has been reached wherein the Province of British Columbia will take 50 per cent and the Fort Nelson Band will receive the other 50 per cent. However, my understanding is that in Canada Indian bands do not receive the entire amount; one-half of their share goes to the trust fund held in Ottawa by the government. Does this situation apply to the Fort Nelson Agreement?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, according to the summary that I have, the agreement does not provide for anything except equal-sharing. The summary of the agreement which I have is that there is to be a 50-50 sharing. What happens after the band receives its share is not part of my information: However, I will try to find out if there is any provision requiring anything other than complete control over that 50 per cent. Is that the question?

Senator Williams: I think this will create a problem for other bands in Canada since this may become a precedent whereby they will take all of their share of whatever resources are being acquired by corporations or governments other than Indians. This means that we would be doing away with something that has been in force since Confederation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, whatever is contained in the provisions of the Indian Act with reference to monies payable to the band will, of course, apply. I have no information or briefing that would indicate that anything but the usual provisions would apply, namely, that the monies payable to the band would be held by the Government of Canada for the use and benefit of the band pursuant to the Indian Act.

Senator Williams: I can foresee another problem. Nineteen-year-olds in bands can vote both federally and provincially; yet, in their own affairs, they can only vote at age 21. To some extent, I agree with the 21-year-old principle. Very simply, Indians have to amend their own by-laws so they can vote at age 19.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. John J. Connolly: I should like to ask a question of the honourable senator, and it arises out of the fact that I did not hear everything he said. My first question is a very simple one. Can he tell us what the population on the reserve is? The second question comes from a misunderstanding on my part. I understood the sponsor of the bill to say that the mineral rights under these lands have been alienated by the Province of British Columbia. Presumably this was not Indian territory or reserve territory until a certain date, and prior to that date these resources were the property of the province.

Now, I understood Senator Frith to say that the province alienated these rights, presumably to a third party, but yet the third party does not seem to be party to this agreement so there must be some explanation as to why there is no third party in the agreement.

It would appear from the explanation given that the Province of British Columbia is entitled to all of the revenues, gross and net, from the exploitation of these lands, and that it will be sharing those on a 50-50 basis with the band. But what about the previous alienation made by the province to a third party? Why is that party not involved?

• (1620)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not know the population of the band. However, I will try to get that information before tomorrow.

Senator Williams: It is 300.

Senator Frith: Senator Williams says it is 300. As he pointed out, and as was pointed out in my speech, two-thirds of them are under the age of 21.

Senator Connolly: They are going to get approximately $60 million?

Senator Frith: Yes. This is held under the provisions of the Indian Act, of course. There are provisions in that act which relate to these funds.

With reference to your second question, my understanding is that the rights have been alienated or transferred in exchange for revenues. The reason the third party is not a party to this agreement is because the province has decided that, since it has alienated those rights to someone else in exchange for revenues received, it is going to share the revenue with the other party. It is similar to someone renting a property out and then saying, "I have rented your property out, so I cannot give you the property, but I have the rent for all time. So, instead of your having the property, I will share the rent with you." In other words, the agreement is to share revenues acquired from those lands. Therefore, no other entity needs to be a party to this agreement since it is simply an agreement by the province to the effect that the revenue it gets from the land will be shared.

Senator Connolly: I take it that implies the revenue the province is now going to share with the band is not the total revenue from the exploitation of the sub-oil resources? There must be a third party taking a portion of that revenue. Perhaps at the next sitting Senator Frith could tell us how much the third party is getting from the exploitation of the sub-soil resources by way of gross or net revenue.

Senator Frith: I also assume that someone else is getting some benefit from it, but of course there is nothing the province can do about that. It is Nemo dat qui non habet. What the province is getting is what it will share.

If I get information on what amount is coming, I shall be glad to give it to you. With reference to this agreement, all the province can agree to do is show the revenue it is getting. If there is other revenue and information available on it, I will find that out for you.

Senator Williams: Honourable senators, I think one of the problems is the fact that, in the northern part of British Columbia, and in the northern part of the other central provinces, in the past there were no designated reserves. The natives were situated there, as they say, from time immemorial. So, this is the problem with Fort Nelson. It became a designated reserve I believe in 1961. The province had already taken it upon itself to own the minerals.

Senator Connolly: The sponsor of the bill said that the province had alienated its rights. However, perhaps we can clear the thing up at the next sitting.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that there is a large sum of money that could be divided among the Indians, which will probably come to approximately a quarter of a million dollars for each of them, is there anything which would safeguard the descendents whereby they could benefit from it in the future? Is there anything to ensure that the descendents would not be left out of it?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there may be provisions in the Indian Act to which the money payable to the band is subject. I shall try to get that information for you.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned

MUNICIPAL GRANTS BILL, 1980

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-4, respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes.

He said: Honourable senators, as one who has spent a great many years associated with local government, I am pleased to sponsor this bill. I should say that during the many years I was mayor of my city, I appealed to ministers of the Crown on many occasions. I may have even appeared before the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate asking for more assistance for local government.

As we are all aware, grants in lieu of taxes on federal property in municipalities across the country, are important items in the budgets of local governments.

As a matter of interest, one of the men most responsible for the development of this program is our esteemed colleague, the Honourable Senator Goldenberg. Back in the 1940s, long before the governments of Canada recognized that they had some kind of moral obligation, at least, to pay local taxes on their properties to municipalities, Senator Goldenberg appeared as counsel for the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities and pleaded their case. What we saw beginning in 1950, to a great degree, is due to the representations he made. I believe Senator Goldenberg's contribution should be acknowledged.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to provide statutory authority for a rather extensive updating and expansion of the program, whereby the federal government is enabled to pay grants in lieu of real property taxes on its holdings to municipalities and provinces across Canada.

The current program has been in effect virtually unchanged since 1957, with the result that in the intervening years there has not been a revision. As a result of that, a number of the sections in the current act have become inadequate or ambiguous. In response to pressures for change from many sources, the bill before you is intended to relieve much of the criticism and irritation that the current grants program has engendered from provinces and local governments in the past.

I wish to qualify that just a bit, because I do know how much local governments appreciate what the federal government has done by making these grants in lieu of taxes available. I am sure that we will never satisfy all local governments and their current needs, which are great indeed. However, as you will see as I move along in discussing this particular bill, the Government of Canada has made substantial progress in meeting the demands of local governments.

It is apparent that there are a great many positive aspects to this bill, not only in terms of providing additional revenue to those municipalities in which federal property is situated, but also in terms of relieving some of the current difficulties of administering the grants program. Perhaps a brief outline of some of the more important provisions of the bill would be of interest and assistance to honourable senators in the deliberations which will follow this introduction.

First, the bill provides a considerable broadening of the definition of federal property on which grants are paid. Virtually all lands and buildings owned by the Government of Canada will be subject to the grant. Additional federal properties on which grants are proposed to be paid include national parks, the Houses of Parliament, administrative and operational buildings at defence bases in rural areas, museums, libraries, concert halls, historic sites, historic parks, reclaimed lands and water conservation and irrigation projects. These are the kinds of properties that will now qualify for payment to municipalities of grants by the federal government in lieu of taxes, and I think that is a very significant step forward.

● (1630)

I notice the Houses of Parliament will now be paying taxes. I am not sure whether Senator Flynn will want to propose an amendment to say that amusement tax should also be added for the benefit of the local government. There are occasions when that just might qualify.

Second, honourable senators, any tax which qualifies as a real property tax on owners of real property, including the heretofore water tax, will enter into the calculation of the grant if applicable to federal property.

Third, the bill sets out how grants are to be determined, making it clear they are to constitute full tax equivalency in almost all cases.

Fourth, most deductions from grants with respect to local government services not received by federal property will be terminated. Virtually the only deduction which will continue to be made is with reference to school services which the federal government either supplies itself or for which alternative arrangements for financing have been made, namely, for example, the education of dependent children of armed forces personnel at rurally-situated bases.

Fifth, it is proposed that the current policy of applying the lowest or preferred tax rate in a dual or multiple tax rate system to the value of certain types of federal property will be revised in calculating the grant. This refers mainly to various property categories owned by the federal government which are normally not taxed at all if owned by other bodies—for example, hospitals, penitentiaries, fire halls, schools, chapels, pumping stations, sewage disposal and water purification plants. Low rates of tax will be used in calculating grants on such properties only where it is clear that they would be applicable if the property were privately owned. To explain it a little further, that involves those municipalities which have a dual or multiple tax system, which have a different level of taxation, for example, on residential property as against commercial property as against industrial property, et cetera. And certainly the federal government, in my opinion, is being very fair in the application of this particular principle.

Sixth, while Indian reserves will continue to be ineligible for grants, any federal building located on a reserve which does not as its prime purpose serve the native inhabitants of the reserve will be eligible for inclusion in grants. In addition, grants on such properties could be paid to Indian band councils if they levy a real property tax.

Seventh, the bill makes provision for regulation by the Minister of Public Works respecting substantial interim grant payments in instances where it may not be possible to finalize a grant promptly, thus assisting in relieving short-term borrowing costs for municipalities. And again I think this will be most welcome by local governments.

Eighth is the provision which is being made for the option of paying local improvement charges on federal property in annual installments, which include blended amounts of principal and interest as an alternative to the present system of paying commuted lump sum amounts which exclude interest. This option will be exercised in cases where it would simplify the administrative work of municipalities.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Ninth, the bill provides for the establishment of guidelines to govern grants by crown corporations on their properties. While the guidelines will apply with a one-year lag—that is that they will not come into effect until 1981—they will ensure that the principles set out in the act for departmental property constitute a minimum to be followed by all crown corporations. And again, honourable senators, I suggest that that is an important improvement.

Honourable senators, the foregoing sets out some of the major highlights of the bill which will benefit taxing authorities by an estimated $25 million annually on federal departmental property alone, when certain changes to be phased in over a four-year period are completed. It will be apparent that the proposed changes in the federal grants program which I have outlined have necessitated that a completely revised statute be drafted rather than attempting to accomplish the same results by amending procedure. That is the reason for this bill. The expanded system of grants which has been brought forward notwithstanding considerable financial strains on the federal government provides cogent evidence that the government recognizes the continuing importance of the grant-in-lieu program.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to recommend that the Senate pass Bill C-4 on second reading.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Buckwold for the enumeration of the items which will be covered by this bill when it becomes law in respect of grants in lieu of taxes. I must say he enumerated some that had not occurred to me as I read the bill, but I do not dispute that in fact they are covered.

I join in his congratulatory comment about our esteemed colleague, Senator Goldenberg. I do have to say though that if I had retained him I would ordinarily have hoped that the results would be noticed more quickly than has been the case in this instance. However, I do not wish to detract in the slightest from the influence he has had on this program, because after all, these bodies with which we are accustomed to deal in legislation of this kind do not move very quickly, and perhaps the fact that they moved at all is a very high indication of the quality of his representation.

There are, of course, and there have been, a great many sources of irritation felt by municipalities in relation to the presence within their boundaries of federal properties which require services, sometimes of a very extensive kind, and thus impose a financial burden upon those municipal units. I agree with him as I read this bill that it will go a long way to eliminate those sources of irritation. I hasten to say to him, however, that I also share his feeling that there will still be cause for objection and complaint, and perhaps even irritation, as time goes by and some of these causes will in fact be due to provisions of the bill, or provisions of regulations made under the bill, or the way in which the statute and regulations are administered by those responsible for them.

I am concerned, however, at the great amount of discretion and power to make regulations apparently given to the minister. As I read the provisions about the regulations there is power in the Governor in Council to add to or delete from any of the schedules to the act any piece of federal property which occurs to them to be desirable to include or take out. I would have thought that this is a wide discretion. While I understand the desirability of making the administration of the bill as flexible as possible, it seems to me that this really is going a bit further than is necessary for that purpose.

If honourable senators look at clause 8 dealing with the power to make regulations they will see exactly what I mean. For instance there is the provision in paragraph 8(1)(a) as follows:

> (a) adding to or deleting from Schedule I any corporation established by or under an Act of Parliament or performing a function on behalf of the Government of Canada that is included in Schedule III and prescribing the real property of such corporation that is to be included in Schedule I;

And then there is paragraph 8(1)(b), which says:

> (b) prescribing criteria for the purposes of paragraph (b) of the definition "other attribute" in subsection 2(1);

• (1640)

Paragraph 8(1)(b) prescribes criteria for the purposes of paragraph (b) of the definition "other attribute," and at first reading "other attribute" becomes a very difficult sort of thing to understand. It may not be as wide in scope as it now seems to be. But, certainly, however honourable senators may eventually interpret that particular provision, it gives very wide power to the Governor in Council. And so it goes up to paragraph (h) of that particular section.

I am not clear, but Senator Buckwold might be able to explain later why it is that the first three sections of the present Municipal Grants Act are left in being, whereas the remaining sections of that statute are not. I have no doubt that there is some administrative reason for it, but it is not apparent from a perusal of the bill. One would have thought that perhaps the transitional provisions from the existing act to the new act might have dealt with all sections of the old act.

I presume also that there was good reason for enumerating certain kinds of federal property set out in schedule III on pages 16, 17 and 18 of the bill, and others in schedule IV. It would appear that those in schedule IV had some commercial connotation in the sense of operating for profit, while the others may not. I am sure there is a simple explanation, and perhaps Senator Buckwold will be able to provide that explanation when he next speaks in the debate.

There are some things included in schedule II on page 15 of the bill, listing things in respect of which grants are not to be made in lieu of taxes, which to me do not seem logically to fall under that classification. It refers to gasoline pumps, pole lines, transmission lines, conveyor belts and conveyor systems. Again there may be some characteristic that separates them from the other items listed in the schedules to which I have referred, but it is not apparent from the bill.

There is not a great deal more that I wish to say, except to draw attention to the fact that the development of this legislation has proceeded under two predecessor administrations. It is certainly a source of some satisfaction to know that the bill, based in large measure upon previous preparation, now seems to be reaching the end of its legislative journey, reaching the point where it will be of real benefit to the municipalities of our country.

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? I was wondering whether, when the federal authority determines the level or the amount of the grant, it is based upon the assessed value of the property at the level fixed by the local municipality. The honourable senator may not have the information now, but perhaps he can provide it at the next sitting.

Senator Buckwold: I can provide the information. The level of the assessment and the tax rate is set by the local government. In other words, when a building is valued by an assessor in the City of Ottawa, that assessment is accepted by the government and grants in lieu of taxes are paid at that rate. The municipality collects the full taxes. The government, with very rare exceptions, would accept the assessment of the local municipality.

Senator Marshall: May I ask Senator Buckwold a question concerning the designation of the municipality? In some provinces, and I refer particularly to Newfoundland, there are small fishing villages known as local improvement districts or community councils, which have the full authority of the provincial government. In those communities there are federal fish plants. Would those local improvement districts and community councils fall within the definition of "a municipality"?

Senator Buckwold: I am not sure if I can give the honourable senator a complete answer. I can only read the explanation of the bill on the front cover, which says:

> An Act respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes.

On the basis of that, if those particular localities levy real property taxes, in my opinion they would be able to receive payments from the federal government in lieu of taxes. If by chance they do not, certainly the province would.

Senator Marshall: Would the honourable senator verify that?

Senator Buckwold: Yes; I will confirm that with the department for the next sitting.

Senator Muir: May I direct a question to Senator Buckwold, following what Senator Connolly has said so eloquently? I may have missed something in the exchange. Are the grants in lieu available to the municipality on the assessment? I think the honourable senator quoted the situation in Ottawa.

Senator Buckwold: I did refer to the City of Ottawa's assessment. I could have used Halifax. I am talking of the assessment of the local government.

Senator Muir: So it would be based on whatever assessment the local assessor in that local area put on the property.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, on the basis of the fact that all buildings in that municipality, city, town, village or hamlet, are assessed on the same basis. In other words, everyone would pay an equal share.

Senator Muir: I was thinking about the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Senator Flynn: I have a question for the honourable senator. With regard to schedule IV, do I understand that Air Canada, falls under this legislation, that it receives treatment which would be different from that applying to CP Air, for instance, in a given municipality, or that the Bank of Canada would be different from another bank, and so on?

Senator Buckwold: Again, I shall clarify that. From my preliminary study of the bill, and discussion with some of the officials of the department, I am led to understand that Air Canada would pay the same as anyone else, as would the Bank of Canada. I will have that clarified before concluding the debate.

Senator Smith: May I be permitted to ask a question that I should have asked when I spoke before? It relates to schedule I, where the only organization enumerated is the National Research Council of Canada. It should be noted that the schedule prescribes certain property in respect of which grants will be paid if the property is described in this particular schedule, but only if it is described in this schedule. The schedule reads:

● (1650)

> National Research Council of Canada, with respect to real property owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada and situated within the City of Ottawa.

Offhand, at least this seems to have the effect of restricting grants which may be paid in lieu of any taxation on the property of this organization to that property which is situated in this city.

Senator Buckwold: Is the honourable senator suggesting that it might be unfair to municipalities outside the city of Ottawa which have National Research Council facilities? I think this makes it clear that Ottawa will receive taxes. Again, I will respond to that after discussion with the officials.

Senator Smith: I am not sure I put my question clearly, so perhaps I might start again. This, I think, would make grants in lieu of taxes applicable to property owned by the National Research Council of Canada which property is situate within the boundaries of the city of Ottawa, but it seems to me, taken in conjunction with the rest of the act, that property of the National Research Council of Canada situate in Halifax, for instance, is exempted from the provisions of this act.

Again, I may have missed something since some of the provisions are a little difficult to visualize precisely.

Senator Buckwold: I think we are on the same wave-length. I will be able to respond to your question tomorrow.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Connolly: The answer may be found in clause 9 which seems to imply that certain crown corporations—and those in schedules III and IV seem to be covered—can make grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities. It may very well be that that clause is creating the problem.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Andrew Thompson moved the second reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-3 makes two amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Both amendments are in response to some very immediate problems, and their implementation will permit continuity of the present act.

I believe all honourable senators recognize the relevance and the importance of the Unemployment Insurance Act to the Canadian worker and to the nation. As in all industrial countries, such legislation is part of that which builds the fabric of a nation. I would hope that mobility, opportunity and access to jobs will never be impeded in any way across Canada. The purpose of this bill is to facilitate the opportunity and also to provide the necessary financing to help workers who, for some reason or another, find themselves unemployed.

I believe that most of us who are acquainted with this statute think back to the original act of the forties. That act certainly emphasized the social insurance aspect of the principle. The approach taken at that time was that benefits would be limited to instances of unforeseen and unavoidable risks. Since the 1940s we have seen changes to this act. In my opinion, we have seen contortions and expansions and, indeed, some of us may feel that we are in a situation where the act has become so entangled and complex that the basic principles are somewhat confused.

Senator Flynn: Lost.

Senator Thompson: As we head into the eighties, we should have a hard and full review of this act and take into account changing employment conditions and the changing work force. Even since the 1940s there have been many changes in the work force. There is now fuller participation of young people and women, and there is the emergence of the multiple earner.

The draftsmen of this act must consider measures enacted and approaches taken by all levels of government across Canada since they can complement and influence the federal approach. We know that the federal government is contemplating a pension conference, and that it is going to take a look at the social security programs. Therefore, it is wise to take a hard and full look at the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I should add that not only has the present minister decided to take this action, but his two predecessors, the Honourable Bud Cullen and the Honourable Ron Atkey, started a full in-depth review and, indeed, many of the suggestions made by both have been implemented in the review which the present minister is undertaking.

When Bill C-14 in 1979 was introduced, there was a general feeling that a review rather than a band-aid approach was needed. I am sure all senators welcome the announcement by the minister that he intends to complete the review which was started by his two predecessors. He intends to produce a white paper in several months' time, at which time all segments of society concerned and interested in this act will be encouraged to make their representations. The minister's findings will then be presented to a parliamentary committee. After full consultation with all affected persons, agencies and governments, it is hoped it will be possible to draft appropriate legislation which will be introduced in 1982.

When I consider the reaction in the other place to these two amendments, it seems to me that, as always, the Unemployment Insurance Act touches the sensitivity of those who represent people in various parts of Canada. Sometimes one hears remarks that the Canadian Parliament, in some way, does not represent the people across the country and that perhaps some regions are ignored. When one reads the proceedings of the Manpower and Immigration Committee of the House of Commons one recognizes that all regions of Canada are represented. One realizes that this Parliament is representative of people all across Canada.

We are all interested in seeing the terms of reference of the review the minister has undertaken to make. He has assured us that the terms of reference will be broad and comprehensive. I would urge him, when he produces the terms of reference, to follow through on that objective. The review is going to look at such areas as:

—streamlining and simplifying the benefit entitlement provisions;

—special benefits for sickness, maternity and retirement;

—the role and impact of regional extended benefits;

—the use of unemployment rates in setting new unemployment insurance benefit entitlements;

—the treatment of persons who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause; —coverage of persons in highly seasonable occupations; and —the impact of the unemployment insurance program on income distribution and redistribution.

In my introduction, I have gone into detail in respect of what the minister has undertaken in the way of a full review of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This bill now before the Senate focuses on two amendments, and two amendments only, but they are both important amendments. One amendment proposes to refinance the unemployment insurance program, while the other extends the variable entrance requirement which is due to expire in December 1980. Refinancing will reinforce the insurance character of the unemployment insurance program. This desire was expressed not only by the current minister, but also by his two predecessors. Extension of the variable entrance requirements allows more time for a thorough and considered examination of the kind of unemployment insurance program Canada should have in the 1980s.

As I said, these are important amendments. One involves a change to the financial arrangement of the program, and the other provides an 18-month extension of the existing provision for the variable entrance requirement that is due to expire in 1980. The minister's approach is that he would continue the latter even though he recognizes that he should be taking a hard look at it. He is going to continue the variable entrance requirement because he wants to see the total picture before he makes further changes. He wants to undertake this comprehensive review rather than give the matter a band-aid treatment.

As to the proposed changes to the financing of the first two phases of unemployment insurance benefits, the amendment would shift to the private sector premium account the total cost of the initial and labour force extended phases of benefits. Let me put this in perspective as it relates to the recent history of the unemployment insurance program.

Before 1971, the unemployment insurance program was financed by equal employer and employee contributions of approximately 40 per cent of program costs. The federal government contributed 20 per cent.

In 1971, the benefit structure was revised and these financial provisions were modified. The 1971 legislation provided that the private sector would finance a share of initial and re-established initial benefits up to the point where the unemployment rate reached 4 per cent. The cost of initial benefits beyond the 4 per cent rate was paid by the government. In addition, the government assumed full responsibility for financing the extended phases of unemployment insurance benefits, which included labour force benefits and other extended benefits based on regional and national rates of unemployment. The cost of sickness, maternity and retirement benefits, and the cost of administration, were paid by the private sector premium account.

In 1976, the financing formula was changed from the 4 per cent unemployment rate. The benefit structure was simplified. A three-phase benefit structure replaced the then existing five-phase structure. The financing threshold of the 4 per cent unemployment rate was replaced by a threshold rate determined by an eight-year moving average of national unemployment rates.

Further changes were made in 1978. Bill C-14 led to the current situation whereby the government pays the full cost of regional extended benefits and the part of the cost of both initial benefits and labour force extended benefits attributable to an unemployment rate exceeding the threshold rate. This worked out in 1979 to a government share of 31 per cent of the unemployment insurance program costs.

Under the financing amendment of Bill C-3, the government will continue to bear the full costs of regional extended benefits. What changes is that the private sector, through its premium contributions, will now pay the costs of all initial benefits and labour force extended benefits. These changes in financing would shift $378 million from government to the private sector in 1980-81. As a result, the government's share of the cost of unemployment insurance benefits will be reduced to about 20 per cent, the same proportion as in the early 1970s.

By allocating all the costs of benefits based on weeks worked to the private sector, the unemployment insurance program would be made more self-financing and, therefore, more insurance-oriented. The government would continue—and I want to stress this—would continue to pay the costs of benefits attributable to regional unemployment levels.

These proposals for changing the financing of the unemployment insurance program will not mean an increase in premium rates paid by employers and employees for 1980. Even with the changes proposed, the unemployment insurance premium account is expected to show a surplus at the end of 1980. As I understand it, the surplus will be in the area of $240 million. I might add, as well, that this particular measure was part of the December 1979 budget proposals of the previous government.

The second substantive amendment proposed by Bill C-3 would extend until June 1982 the existing 10- to 14-week variable entrance requirement. If no extension is approved, the entrance requirement, as I stated before, would revert to a flat 14 weeks of insurable work across Canada. As I said, the minister is intending to undertake a full review of the procedure.

Honourable senators, that really covers the two main amendments to the bill.

On motion of Senator Donahoe, debate adjourned.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND –ORDER STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-10, intituled: "An act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that this order again stand until later this day.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

CANADA AND THE COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN AREA

DESIRABILITY OF CLOSER COMMERCIAL AND CULTURAL RELATIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, May 28, 1980:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of promoting closer commercial and cultural relations between Canada and, in particular, to the desirability of recommending to the government that steps be taken to provide for

(a) subsidization of ocean transport between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean area;

(b) assistance in the upgrading of the seaports of Atlantic Canada;

(c) tariff changes to facilitate the exchange of commodities between the two areas;

(d) greater exchange of students between the two areas; and

(e) assistance to encourage meetings of political, business and educational leaders of the two areas with a view to stimulating a mutually advantageous North-South exchange of goods, people, services and technology.

[Senator Thompson.]

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure it is to your great delight that I am prepared to announce that I am making no substantive remarks today. I am no clockwatcher, but I can tell the time. I would like in a procedural way to thank Senator Frith for his procedural co-operation in the arrangement of this period. It did not work, but I thank him for his courtesy. This was to have been the best day. I thank Senator Macdonald for waiving his time, but I am not certain as to how I should proceed. I was happy that the high commissioners from the six Commonwealth Caribbean states were in the gallery today, but as time went by one by one they have gone. I do not like to give them the impression that I am not interested in speaking to the measure if they are not here, nor do I have the presumption to ask them to come again some other day. So I would like to reflect as to whether or not I shall resume remarks on this inquiry on another occasion or request that it be allowed to drop.

This inquiry deals with a very serious part of the world, a de-stabilizing area. It is a vehicle I have used in the House of Commons for many years, and an identical one is proceeding there under the name of Mr. Forrestall, and I thought it might be a valuable communication for Parliament to make to our neighbours in the south.

There is here a procedural situation which I thought was prevalent in the House of Commons but not so much here, that is the role of the private member or the private senator. It is very easy for an ordinary senator to put down a notice of inquiry, but it is not so easy for him to proceed with it, because bills that are emanations of government come before him and then people yawn and look at their watches and say, "Merciful heavens, it is late." There must be some more accessible procedural avenue for those who are not emanations of the government, and some day in the future I hope we will have a chance to discuss that. So I would like to adjourn the debate and reflect upon my future intentions.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that we hoped to have a report from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Bill C-30 before 6 o'clock. For that reason I am now asking honourable senators whether, rather than adjourning to the call of the bell, we should use the time until receiving that report by reviving Bill S-10, which we buried a moment or two ago, and allow Senator Stanbury to make his comments on the motion for second reading. Then we can wait and see what transpires.

Senator Smith: May I interject here to mention another matter for consideration. It will be recalled by members of the Transport and Communications Committee that a meeting of that committee was called for when the Senate rises today. The witnesses from the Department of Transport and from the Department of External Affairs have been waiting for some time. I wonder if it would be satisfactory to honourable senators if I were to move with leave that the committee have power to sit while the Senate is sitting to allow the committee to deal with that matter.

Senator Frith: As long as we can maintain a quorum, I think that is an excellent idea. This is to deal with the bill concerning the hijacking of aircraft. May I suggest that we put both proposals before honourable senators, that is to deal with Bill S-10 and that Senator Smith's committee have leave to sit while the Senate is sitting.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Stanbury's pride is not too hurt, I do not mind, but if it is we could very well adjourn to the call of the bell and probably facilitate the sitting of Senator Smith's committee.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, may I put forward what could be a lucid or perhaps a fluid suggestion. I had planned to have a reception for the high commissioners in Room 601 so that they might meet some honourable senators. The room has been hired and the booze has been bought and I am going there now. I welcome anybody who wishes to chat about the Caribbean.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, what with all the invitations we are getting, our agenda is quite full, is it not?

[English]

In any event, I would like to have Senator Stanbury deal with Bill S-10, if that is possible, and still allow Senator Smith's committee to meet. I suspect that it is going to be a fairly short meeting. Then, with our thirsts thus whetted, if one whets thirst, we could move on to the third invitation, the one we have just received from Senator Macquarrie.

Senator Smith: Would it be appropriate to move with leave that the committee on Transport and Communications be given permission to sit while the Senate is sitting today?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET WHILE THE SENATE IS SITTING

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. G. I. Smith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, contrary to what the magicians sometimes say, I have something else up my sleeve, and that is the possibility of adopting the report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee on Senator Choquette's private bill. That, I think I can guarantee, will be very short. Senator Goldenberg could report and then we could have third reading; otherwise, we could get caught with the bill not being dealt with until next fall, and I am sure that we would all like to co-operate in seeing to it that that does not happen.

PRIVATE BILL

PYRAMID COMMUNICATIONS LIMITED—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-8, to revive Pyramid Communications Limited, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Lionel Choquette: With leave, now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill S-10, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

He said: Honourable senators, under the circumstances, I am quite happy to be the pinch hitter or gap filler—whatever you want to call me—but it is a pleasure for me to have the opportunity of presenting Bill S-10.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I rise today to discuss Bill S-10, an Act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, commonly known as CALURA. As you know, this bill was brought before the Senate last Monday, July 14.

[English]

This is the fourth in a succession of bills similarly entitled, and with only slight variations to take account of the concerns of the business and labour communities.

Bill C-7 received first reading in the House of Commons on October 26, 1977; it received second reading on March 3, 1978; it was considered by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in the other place at meetings held on June 8, 16, 20 and 22; and the bill died on the order paper on June 30, 1978. However, it had received the support of all parties in the committee of the other place.

Amendments were reintroduced in Bill C-3, which received first reading on November 16, 1978. That bill also died on the order paper, on March 26, 1979. Amendments were reintroduced in Bill C-12, which received first reading on November 19, 1979 and died on the order paper on December 18, 1979. The measure has been given to the Senate, and it now appears as Bill S-10.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we must study the provisions of Bill S-10 with dispatch as they have been long awaited by tens of thousands of relatively small businesses. The amendments are chiefly designed to reduce the paper work and the time required for filling in returns and the related costs.

Because its measures are aimed at standardizing the collection of data, Bill S-10 is truly apropos and well in line with the current government's stated intention to provide more efficient working methods.

The act has been in force for 17 years against an economic backdrop which has changed in many ways. The economy has become much more complex and, to define the national policy, more data was needed in order to follow its development. The proposed amendments in Bill S-10 will reflect the current situation and simplify the methods for collecting data on businesses.

At the moment, more than 90,000 corporations fill in questionnaires on ownership in compliance with this act. Most of these respondents are small Canadian businesses which, originally, did not fall within the purview of the act.

Bill S-10 should dispense more than 70,000 such businesses from having to send in a return pursuant to the act.

At this time, a corporation must file a return if its assets exceed $250,000 or if its sales amount to more than $500,000. According to the bill, the threshold will be multiplied by 20. Only those companies with assets of $5 million or more or whose sales figures exceed $10 million will be required to send in a return. Companies whose shares are partly owned by non residents will also be required to produce returns.

To avoid overlapping of data, the eight existing questionnaires will be amalgamated into one. These questionnaires include those which were used in accordance with the Statistics Act and the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act as well as those used by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce according to guidelines of sound business practices.

To allow government to have a better understanding of foreign technological aid, the bill provides for the collection of certain data on technology transfers.

The data derived from corporate returns concerning transfers of technology will be available for study within the federal government. Access to this data will be severely regulated just like the access to financial data. Information will be provided to analysts only on the request of a minister and subject to the approval of the Chief Statistician who will prescribe under what conditions this information will be released.

The information on ownership being gathered under the act at this time is not confidential; the public may gain access to it by contacting the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. To that end, Bill S-10 proposes the following improvements.

Corporations with 50 shareholders or less will be required to declare their actual shareholders. All other corporations can use their shareholders' registers to declare the shares being held. On the other hand, all corporations must declare the options and voting rights held by directors and the name of any corporation holding 10 per cent or more of the voting rights.

These measures are intended to provide Parliament and the public with specific and current information on the ownership and control of corporations. Together with the financial information, they will also enable us to make a more accurate assessment of foreign control and corporate concentration in the hands of large corporations and thus help carry out the terms of reference set out in the act.

The changes dealing with labour unions will lead to significant improvements in the enforcement of the law, the quality of data and the timeliness of statements.

To give a more complete picture of union activities in Canada, the bill proposes to broaden the definition of labour unions to include independent unions without affiliation and locals.

To allow a more exhaustive examination of the financial operations of unions in Canada, the bill forces international unions to declare all direct receipts from their affiliated unions in Canada and all expenses directly related to their activities in Canada. In addition, unions will be required to declare financial information relating to special funds such as retirement and strike funds separately from general revenues and expenditures. Consequently, the quality of financial data published in the annual report on unions will be considerably improved, and this will facilitate the comparative analysis which is one of the purposes of the act.

Finally, to shorten delays in tabling the annual report before Parliament labour unions will be required to produce their returns within 90 days following the end of the year for which the data is required.

In my presentation, honourable senators, I pointed out the main aspects of Bill S-10. I also stressed the importance of that legislation for the country and the way in which the proposed amendments are to simplify administration of the act. This is a timely piece of legislation. I do hope the bill can be given rapid, but serious, consideration so we can all have the satisfaction of seeing it passed by Parliament.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Would Senator Stanbury allow me a question?

Senator Stanbury: In English, please.

Senator Frith: Of course.

• (1730)

[English]

On the question of whether this bill should be referred to a committee, could Senator Stanbury tell us if he has had an opportunity to study the history of the bill so far as its consideration by previous committees is concerned? He made reference to that fact, and I am wondering whether the reports of those committees are available, because they might save us the trouble of referring the bill to committee. Is it his feeling that a Senate bill requires reference to a committee of the Senate, and, if so, which committee? Perhaps he could tell us a little about the background of the bill.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I can give you a résumé of what has happened in committees of the other place and what changes were made. That may assist in answering the question.

There was a great deal of consultation with both business and labour in coming to a conclusion on this bill. As I mentioned earlier, this is the fourth emanation of this bill. It has had a lot of study, and there have been many amendments, and I feel it might be difficult to come up with further amendments which would not immediately cause difficulty for those with whom there has been a great deal of consultation in the past under three governments.

It might be helpful if I read a couple of paragraphs of this summary which say that the present bill differs from predecessors in that the Minister of Supply and Services is named as the minister responsible for the act. Otherwise, the bill under consideration is the same as Bill C-12 introduced in the last Parliament.

Bill C-12 differed from its predecessor, Bill C-3, in that Bill C-12 provided for more control of access to financial data collected under the act in the same manner that access to information concerning technology transfers is to be controlled. The purpose of this change was to accommodate certain business concerns related to the sharing of identifiable data.

Under Bill C-3, access to financial data by federal government officials was more open. Bill C-3, which received first reading on November 16, 1978, succeeded Bill C-7 which received first reading in the House of Commons on October 26, 1977, and second reading on March 3, 1978, and was considered by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in June 1978. The bill was supported by all political parties in the standing committee. Bill C-3 incorporated changes made to its predecessor to accommodate certain proposals made by business and labour, and to meet some of the concerns expressed during the proceedings of the standing committee.

Honourable senators, that is a relatively brief summary of the changes.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have just received a report from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that its progress is satisfactory, and that it expects to report to us by six o'clock this evening. I would therefore suggest that we adjourn, to resume at the call of the bell. When we return, we will hear the committee's report.

• (1740)

I do want to talk to Senator Flynn during the interim about something which has developed in the meantime. Then I would ask that we revert to Notices of Motions so that I can move that we sit at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, and I want to discuss that with Senator Flynn also. So that is what is before us.

I wish to thank honourable senators for sitting through this difficult but at times interesting afternoon.

I propose, therefore, that we adjourn now to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 6 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 6 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1980-81

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I could make a comment at this time about Bill S-7. Honourable senators were good enough to give leave to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to sit while the Senate was sitting this afternoon. The committee sat and dealt with the business that was before it, but it was requested by certain officials to consider a further amendment. So we are not yet ready to report the bill, but we are meeting again tomorrow at 9.30 a.m. Perhaps members of the committee who are here now would take this as notice. We are getting out written notices, but they may or may not arrive as quickly as my voice does now.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask leave to revert to notices of motion so that I can move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock. The hope, pursuant to our earlier discussions, is that we can have royal assent for Bill C-30 at about noon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Granted.

Senator Frith: Then, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, what about all the committees scheduled to sit tomorrow morning? I understand there is a total of seven. There is one committee sitting to deal with the official languages report and then at 11.30 there is the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. Are they going to meet later in the day?

Senator Frith: There is no question that the arrangements for Senate committees tomorrow morning create a problem for us, one we inherit from the problems we tried to solve today. One committee is scheduled to sit at 11.30 a.m., but most of the others are sitting at 9.30 a.m. I think we will just have to do our best, and I shall consult with the Leader of the Opposition to see if there is a way that we can deal with that portion of our orders for tomorrow that needs to be dealt with for the royal assent. Then we can continue with our work in the afternoon at 2 o'clock. I think the point is well taken and we will try to work it out so that we will be able to continue with legislation and other items in the afternoon. It may mean that we will have to leave our committees for a while in the morning.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, my leader raised the point I was going to mention. I hate to be "small" about these things, but some members of the media often say that we in this chamber never do anything and that we are not very active. I would like note taken of the fact that we were running from one committee to another, from one session to another, and now we are at a point where we don't know if we are having committee meetings tomorrow. The Internal Economy Committee is scheduled to sit at 11.30 and other committees are also scheduled to sit. I hope the situation will be clarified tomorrow if this motion goes through, as I know it will. I hope that note will be taken by the electronic and written media that so many people in this chamber are extremely busy at all times, and that they are not just sitting around here doing nothing.

Senator Perrault: The universe will unfold.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 17, 1980

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-18, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

IRANIAN ECONOMIC SANCTIONS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-31, to provide for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Copies of a discussion paper proposing changes to Canadian import legislation entitled "Proposals on Import Policy", dated July 1980, issued by the Department of Finance.

Report of the President of the Medical Research Council of Canada, including accounts and financial statement certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 17 of the Medical Research Council Act, Chapter M-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Arts Centre, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 17 of the National Arts Centre Act, Chapter N-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board) tabled:

Copies of document entitled "The Review of the Western Grain Stabilization Program 1976-1978".

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 740)

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, this notice of inquiry which I wish to give today may provoke a little humour. I give notice that on Tuesday next, July 22, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, tabled in the Senate today.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to publish and distribute its report on the subject matter of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency," as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not be sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I have no self-interest because I am not a member of the hard-working Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, but I do know as a senator from Ontario that a great deal of good work is done by committees of the Legislature of Ontario when it has permission to sit in a recess, and I think a modest compensation is given to those members who attend.

I notice that the motion before us does not contain any reference to sittings during the recess, which may be fairly long, but it should be kept in mind by the new chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration that a lot of our good work is done in committees. We are a little hard pressed to do the work that we have when we are sitting. In any event, I think that some consideration should be given to occasionally granting permission for a committee to sit during a recess, and authorizing a modest compensation for those senators who attend such sittings.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I should point out to you that my motion does not in any way refer to further sittings of this committee. The committee has concluded its sittings. It has prepared and approved its report. That report is completed in English and it will be some time tomorrow, most likely, before the French translation will be completed. So there is no problem of further sittings. It is simply that we are required to table the report both in English and French, and that is not possible today having regard to the present plans for adjourning for the summer recess.

That is the reason for the motion. One hates to have it sit around all summer. The matter may become old news by then, and a substantial number of people have been in communication with me and with other members of the committee, wishing to get this report as soon as possible, because the legislation has been on the go in the form of one bill or another since 1975.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I heard distinctly the words of the motion and I know that it did not involve the proposition that I advanced. However, generally speaking I am opposed to committee reports being delivered to press conferences and the media and otherwise after senators have done a lot of hard work, and are not assembled. I normally regret that, but I know this is an exceptional circumstance. I simply raise the proposition that there are some hard-working senators—I have not been one this session—who occasionally could be called on urgent matters to sit in committee in recess.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the program we propose for today is as follows: This morning we will proceed with the third reading stage of Bill C-30, the supplementary borrowing authority bill, which was sponsored by Senator Langlois and given second reading yesterday. We will ask that we proceed with that item now, ahead of Question Period. If the bill is given third reading, we look forward to it being given royal assent at noon today, along with other bills that have received third reading. In the interim between the third reading of Bill C-30 and royal assent, we will proceed with the Question Period.

Then we propose to adjourn until 3 o'clock this afternoon to give some committees an opportunity to work in the meantime. In that regard I might announce that the meeting of the Internal Economy Committee, which was scheduled for 11.30 this morning, will take place instead at 2.15 this afternoon in room 263-S.

After resuming at 3 o'clock, we propose to deal with the bills that we have received from the other place. Some committees may sit this afternoon on some of those bills in the hope that they can be dealt with and reported later in the day, all with a view to having royal assent tonight at about 10 o'clock. By that time we should have cleaned up all the business we will have received from the other place, and our own business on the order paper not connected directly with bills. If that plan is successful, we will complete our work tonight at 10 o'clock and we will be able to adjourn until the fall.

Our work during the day will be what is on the order paper now, plus the two bills that were given first reading this morning.

I thank honourable senators for their attendance during the lengthy sitting yesterday, and I thank them in advance for the work we will get done here today with a view to finishing our business before the adjournment. The other house will not be sending us any more business before their own adjournment. The motion for adjournment in the other place will take up all of their business tomorrow.

Accordingly, honourable senators, might I ask leave to have Order No. 1 appearing on the Orders of the Day brought forward for consideration at this time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising again this morning, but apropos the business of the day, could I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether the House of Commons is unusually sitting, as we are unusually sitting on a Thursday morning at 11 o'clock, and whether in the other place they will receive any report from the cabinet meeting, which is usually held on Thursday, relative to the prebuild part of the pipeline, which was so well dealt with this morning and at other meetings of the Senate Finance Committee?

● (1115)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with reference to the first question, the answer is yes, the other place is sitting at 11 o'clock this morning. On the question concerning a report on what is commonly called the prebuild, I shall have to defer to my colleagues, either the Minister of State for Economic Development or the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not anticipated that there will be a statement on the so-called prebuild during the course of our activities this afternoon. I defer to my colleague, Senator Olson, who has the responsibility for that important matter.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, another meeting of cabinet is called for 5 o'clock this afternoon. I think that most senators know better than to anticipate what the results may be.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1980-81

THIRD READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to say a few words on third reading of Bill C-30? As honourable senators are aware, yesterday the bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The government was represented by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and the Assistant Deputy Minister of that department.

I must say that there was a spirit of great co-operation at the meeting. The witnesses were most forthcoming and provided the committee with some valuable information. The witnesses tabled, for the information of the committee, background information, which I regret we did not have in time for the debate in this chamber. Had we received the information earlier, the debate would have been much more informative, certainly from my own point of view, and perhaps we would not have had cause to send the bill to committee.

In any event, many of the questions that were asked in the house were answered in committee, and it was a very useful exercise.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

July 17, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert George Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of July, at 12.00 noon, for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DERAILMENT—CONDITION OF CNR TRACKAGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government and has to do with the report of the rail damage in Mississauga and items arising therefrom.

In view of the fact that a Carleton University professor indicates that the rail system of CNR is absolutely deplorable, can the Leader of the Government indicate what action the Department of Transport is going to take to bring CN to task to ensure that work will be continued to improve the trackage rather than concentrating on policies and regulations that do nothing to alleviate the present deplorable situation? There are so many accidents that they are being treated as commonplace.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin and other representatives in this chamber from Manitoba have made a number of representations regarding the Garrison Dam project. I have been asked to provide the house with a copy of a communication from the Government of the United States in respect to this matter.

As I already indicated earlier this month, the government, through our embassy in Washington, secured confirmation from the United States that the new Garrison appropriation will not be spent on aspects of the project affecting Canada. This assurance, which was not conveyed in writing but rather was made orally by senior administration representatives, is however fully consistent with earlier formal U.S. government assurances to Canada regarding the transboundary implications of the Garrison project. These assurances were contained in several diplomatic notes, copies of which are being made available to Senator Roblin for his information.

I have here much of the material requested by Senator Roblin. I have the text of the notes exchanged between the U.S. Department of State and the Canadian embassy in Washington, D.C. If honourable senators would like to have this material incorporated in the Debates of the Senate of today's date, I would be pleased to make that suggestion because of the importance of the issue. The documentation is too long to read in its entirety at the present moment.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The Notes follow:)

Note from Canadian Embassy to U.S. Department of State, October 23, 1973

The Canadian Embassy presents its compliments to the Department of State and has the honour to refer its Notes No. 313 of October 19, 1971 and No. 35 of January 25, 1973, concerning the effect on water quality in the Souris River of the proposed Garrison Diversion Project in the State of North Dakota.

The Embassy reaffirms that the Government of Canada continues to be gravely concerned that return flows from the irrigation of land in the Souris Loop and areas adjacent to tributaries of the Red River will significantly and seriously degrade water quality in these two Rivers. The Government of Canada has concluded that based on studies conducted in both countries the proposal would run counter to the obligations assumed by the United States under Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 that:

"... waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other."

Studies have been undertaken in Canada that indicate that communities, such as Souris and Portage La Prairie, would be required either to seek alternative sources of water supply or undertake additional treatment of present water supplies drawn from the Souris and Assiniboine Rivers. The attachments to this Note contain more detailed explanations of the injury to property resulting from transboundary pollution likely to be incurred by these two Canadian municipalities. The Department of State will understand that the property damage values listed are indicative and minimum values and do not represent other injury to health or property that might be incurred. Such other injury by way of example would include: the unsuitability of the Souris return flows for irrigation purposes, and for various industrial uses including food processing; and adverse effects that may accrue to other downstream interests on both rivers from the Boundary to Lake Winnipeg. In short, options available to Canada for the use of the flows of these Rivers will be severely limited by the Garrison Diversion.

The Government of Canada is also mindful that on July 13, 1972 the Canadian Minister of Environment and the Chairman of the United States President's Council on Environmental Quality jointly reaffirmed their support for Principle 21 of the Declaration on Human Environment that:

"States have, in accordance with the charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond national jurisdiction."

The Department of State will recall that the group of Canadian and U.S. officials which was to consider alternatives to the present plans for the Garrison Diversion so as to protect Canadian interests, has met only once. No agreement could be reached as to the terms of reference for the group and thus no progress has been achieved through this mechanism.

The Government of Canada is confident the United States Government will recognize the need to avoid degradation of the water of the Souris River passing into Canada. Accordingly, the Government of Canada requests urgently that the Government of the United States establish a moratorium on all further construction of the Garrison Diversion Unit until such time as the United States and Canadian Governments can reach an understanding that Canadian rights and interests have been fully protected in accordance with the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty.

The Government of Canada looks forward to an early reply to this request. Further, the Government of Canada suggests that senior officials from both sides representing all interests meet quickly, following the establishment of a moratorium, to reach the understanding described above.

The Canadian Embassy avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Department of State the assurances of its highest considerations.

Note from U.S. State Department to Canadian Embassy, Washington, February 5, 1974

The Department of State refers to the Canadian Embassy's Note 432 dated October 23, 1973, concerning the possible effects of the proposed Garrison Diversion Unit in the State of North Dakota on the quality of waters flowing into Canada.

The United States notes Canada's concern that its waters may be adversely affected by the projected future development of the Garrison Diversion Unit, Canada's views regarding the relevance of Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty to the continued development of the project, and Canada's request for a moratorium on further construction. The United States wishes to point out that construction work presently underway on the Garrison Diversion Unit will itself not affect waters flowing into Canada. In any development of features of the Garrison Diversion Unit that will affect Canada, specifically works in the Red River Basin and the Souris Loop, the U.S. will comply with its obligation to Canada not to pollute water crossing the boundary "to the injury of health or property" within Canada. No construction potentially affecting waters flowing into Canada will be undertaken unless it is clear that this obligation will be met.

To this end, the Department of the Interior has underway studies to identify and quantify the beneficial and adverse effects of further development of the Garrison Diversion Unit including possible effects on Canadian interests. Many of the effects of water quality and flows have not been fully evaluated by either country. Initial phases of the studies will be completed in March. At that time, the U.S. will further review the future development of the Garrison Diversion Unit in light of all relevant factors, including Canada's concerns and the U.S. obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty. The U.S. also notes Canada's suggestion that senior officials of both countries meet quickly to reach an understanding regarding Canadian rights and interests. The United States is equally desirous of holding such a meeting in order to assess fully the potential impact of the project on Canada, to consider possible solutions to the problem, and to resolve outstanding policy issues. Such a meeting could be most beneficially conducted after the completion of the initial phases of the studies referred to above, and after Canada has had an opportunity to review these studies and to evaluate the information pertaining to the effects of return flows on Canada.

Note from U.S. Department of State to Canadian Embassy, Washington, February 18, 1977

Garrison Diversion Unit

The Department of State refers to the Canadian Embassy's Note No. 495 covering the construction of the Garrison Diversion Unit of the Pick Sloan Missouri Basin program and requesting that further construction and decisions on construction of the Lonetree Reservoir be deferred, in view of potential transfer of biota from the Missouri River Basin into Canadian waters, until such time as the report of the International Joint Commission on the Transboundary aspects of the Garrison Diversion Unit has been received and been the subject of bilateral consultations.

The Department of State has been informed by the Department of the Interior that the construction of the Lonetree Reservoir would not be completed under the present construction schedule until August 1979. Filling of the reservoir with waters from the Missouri River system is not scheduled to begin until after the construction has been completed, i.e., until May 1981 at the earliest. Thus a considerable period of time would elapse between the scheduled publication in June 1977 of the International Joint Commission report on the Transboundary impacts of the Garrison Diversion Unit and the 1981 date for the commencement of filling of the Lonetree Reservoir with Missouri River Basin waters.

Nonetheless, in order to meet the concerns expressed in the Embassy's Note regarding the potential transfer of foreign biota from the Missouri River into waters flowing into Canada, the United States Government wishes to advise the Government of Canada that a contract of the construction of the Lonetree Dam will not be let until after the report to Governments of the International Joint Commission has been received and subsequent consultations between the two governments have taken place.

The Embassy will recall that the joint reference from Governments to the International Joint Commission specifically calls upon the Commission to examine the issue of the potential transmission of foreign biota from the area of the Garrison Diversion Unit into Canada.

The United States Government reiterates its commitment of February 5, 1974, to undertake no construction of works in the Garrison Diversion Unit potentially affecting waters flowing into Canada until it is clear that its obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 will be met.

These undertakings are in keeping with the spirit of mutual understanding and forebearance which has characterized and will continue to characterize the efforts of the two governments in addressing transfrontier pollution matters.

The United States Government looks forward to early discussions with the Government of Canada following the report to Government of the International Joint Commission.

Senator Perrault: In connection with the Garrison Dam project, on June 26, Senator Roblin asked the following question:

> I believe the minister in question met with the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Cecil Andrus, to ask the Government of the United States, the executive branch, what they would do in the event of the bill's passing in its present form with the money for the Garrison in the appropriation. Is it true that he met with the secretary and, if so, what answer did he get to his inquiries?

Honourable senators, I am informed that during his recent visit to Washington, D.C., the Minister for Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, did indeed meet United States Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Cecil Andrus. At that time he reiterated Canada's concerns over the provision of any new funding by Congress for the Garrison Diversion project in North Dakota. Secretary Andrus reaffirmed that, in the event the additional appropriation of $9.7

million received subsequent Congressional approval—as it has since done—this funding would only be spent on aspects of the project providing for no drainage into, or effect on, Canada's waters.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to see this matter followed very closely by those responsible on our behalf. The fact is that every year we seem to be in the same predicament. The Government of the United States of America is always allotting a sum of money to the area of the Garrison Dam, and every year there is an addition to the project, and every year we come closer to the point where Manitoba will be receiving water which we do not want.

This is of real concern to Manitobans, and representations have been made on their behalf.

The Leader of the Government has tabled some documents which I should like to read before I make any further comment on this matter. However, the fact remains that, to my knowledge, over the last few years the Americans have substantially added to that project. Some people may think that $9 million this year is not a large amount, but the project is moving closer to a point where we do not want it.

For those reasons I would request the Leader of the Government to make representations on behalf of Manitobans to the cabinet that this matter be followed very closely, not only with the government in Washington but also with the International Joint Commission that is involved.

Senator Perrault: The Garrison issue, of course, is regarded by the government as an extremely important one for all Canadians wherever they live. Certainly a commitment can be given that this will be at the top of the priority list in the weeks to come.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I intended to rise before the Leader of the Government made that statement. With complete enthusiasm as an ex-Manitoban, I join with Senator Guay in his remarks. As a senator from Ontario which immediately adjoins Manitoba, I believe it is a matter of great concern in the area I represent west of the Lakehead. I also hope that all honourable senators will, as they did before, continue to support Manitoba's great concern.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—PROPOSED ENERGY DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Olson, but I see that he has left the chamber and, therefore, will direct it to the Leader of the Government.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that he intends to ask Alberta to share its windfall in energy prices. Would the Leader of the Government indicate what portion of the provincial revenues the Prime Minister wishes Alberta to share?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, negotiations have been proceeding with the Government of Alberta for some considerable period of time. Indeed, I believe negotiations were begun by the previous government. These negotiations have not been easy. The Premier of Alberta, naturally, hopes to bargain successfully on behalf of the Province of Alberta. However, I believe that all Canadians, wherever they live, realize that Confederation requires sharing in all forms, not merely in terms of natural resources, but it involves sharing of industrial opportunities, an equitable sharing of transportation opportunities and economic development. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister has expressed this philosophy on many occasions.

It is not possible to give the honourable senator a specific dollar amount at this time since a number of figures relating to energy costs and revenue are on the table, and it is expected that when the Prime Minister meets the Premier of Alberta in a few days, there will be further bargaining positions discussed. Indeed, additional figures may be placed on the table. The hope is that an agreement can be achieved in the spirit of Canadian unity and in the spirit of sharing which, at the same time, does not work inequitable hardship on the people of Alberta or any one province.

Senator Sherwood: Is the Leader of the Government able to provide any details of the energy development fund which it is apparently the intention of the government to create?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when the government approached the task of developing an energy policy and plan, it was felt that the policy must be multi-faceted and designed to encourage conservation and to provide adequate incentives for those involved in the development of new energy resources, both in the traditional fossil fuel areas and in other energy development areas such as tidal energy on the Atlantic coast, geo-thermal energy, and other innovative energy forms. Of fundamental importance, at a time when the rate of growth of the economy has slowed, is the need to ensure that the consumer of energy is not burdened with an inordinate weight of cost and taxation. Consistent with its campaign pledges, I assure honourable senators that a great deal of work is being invested by the government in a comprehensive national energy plan, and it is hoped that the details of that plan can be made known in the near future.

AIRLINES

SASKATCHEWAN—FRONTIER AIRLINES SERVICE CONNECTING PROVINCE WITH U.S.A.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in his capacity as the representative in the cabinet of the Province of Saskatchewan. The people of Saskatchewan were delighted to learn recently that the application of Frontier Airlines to provide an air service connecting Saskatoon, Regina, and Minot, with connecting flights to Denver and other parts of the United States, had been approved by the Canadian Transport Commission. However, there is considerable concern that this approval is for the relatively short period of two years and that, in fact, it is not a bilateral air agreement.

My question of the minister is: What assurance can he give that would ease our concern about this important air connection which, by the way, is the only direct route from Saskatchewan to the United States? Can he assure us that this connecting service will be placed on a more permanent basis?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Buckwold I can say the decision was made by the regional office of the Canadian Transport Commission located in Saskatoon. I visited some of their officers, and I was in Saskatoon immediately after the decision was made known. As I understand it, their decision was a favourable one. They did everything they could under their authority to make this service available to Saskatchewan residents. They approved a Saskatoon-Regina-Minot route to be served by Frontier Airlines, but on the understanding and with the assurance that later on the route would be extended to Denver. This route is to be served by jet aircraft of the type that Frontier uses throughout the continental United States.

It is clear that for it to be a permanent service it has to be part of a bilateral agreement between Canada and the United States. My understanding is that Canada is supportive of such a bilateral agreement. This decision by the regional office of the Canadian Transport Commission makes it possible for this service to be provided by Frontier Airlines for Saskatchewan and American residents on a start-up basis this fall, and for a period of two years.

I am optimistic myself that this is the beginning of a permanent international service to the United States for residents of Saskatchewan. It is important to our tourist trade, particularly the tourist trade development of northern Saskatchewan, and it is an essential service for Saskatchewan because up until now Saskatchewan residents who wanted to travel by air to the United States had to go either through Calgary or Winnipeg.

I can appreciate the concern of Senator Buckwold and others in Saskatchewan that a two-year interim permit only has been granted, but I am optimistic that it will be made permanent. My advice—if I may be so bold as to give it—would be for all those concerned to take an optimistic view, to get the service under way as soon as possible, and make the best opportunity they can of this decision which is very much to the credit of the regional office of the Canadian Transport Commission.

ENERGY

EXTENSION OF Q & M PIPELINE TO HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, but in his absence perhaps the Leader of the Government can take it as notice.

I have been concerned that the decision of the National Energy Board to extend the gas pipeline from Montreal to Quebec City did not include an extension to Halifax, which I feel the present government was committed to.

I hope the minister responsible, and the government as a whole, will seriously consider the application made by Q & M Pipeline. According to their statement of fact, an environmental study was made from Montreal to Quebec City, and exactly the same kind of study was made from Quebec City to Halifax. Taking into consideration the fact that the maritime provinces are so heavily dependent upon oil for the generation of electric power, and the abundance of western gas that is available, the Government of Canada should encourage Q & M to re-apply, or find some other way to proceed immediately with the construction of the gas pipeline to the maritimes.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I can assure honourable senators that as we develop a comprehensive energy policy for the nation, the natural gas requirements of the maritimes will be very much in the minds of all of those who are engaged in the planning process. Consideration is being given to the feasibility and practicability of such an extension.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have planned, as you know, to have royal assent at 12 noon. The Leader of the Government is now on his way to meet His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency, and I propose in a moment to move that we adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency.

After royal assent we will adjourn until 3 o'clock this afternoon, at which time we will continue the Question Period and then proceed to Orders of the Day.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Rimouski.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Hastings-Frontenac.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Berthier-Maskinongé.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Cochrane.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Argenteuil.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Verdun.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Sainte-Marie.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Mercier.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Richmond.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Montmorency.

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Laprairie.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PROHIBITION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. G. I. Smith, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 17, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred Bill S-7, intituled: "An Act to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, June 26, 1980, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 2, Clause 3(1): Strike out line 13 in the English version and substitute the following:

"an territory; and"

2. Page 2, Clause 3(2): Strike out line 19 and substitute the following:

"unlawful act or has not permitted the continuation of the journey of the passengers and crew of an aircraft in respect of which an unlawful act has been committed or has not returned an aircraft in"

3. Page 2, Clause 5: Strike out line 42 and substitute the following:

"conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty-five thou-"

Respectfully submitted,

G. I. Smith,
Chairman.

● (1150)

He said: Honourable senators, it will take me just a moment to explain the amendments. The first is merely a drafting change, in that it changes the word "or" to the word "and" in line 13 on page 2.

The second amendment is one of some substance. It will be recalled that clause 3(2) provides that a state is in default, under the provisions of the act, if it has not extradited or prosecuted any of the parties or has not returned an aircraft in respect of which an unlawful act has been committed. This amendment is simply to add the words "or has not permitted the continuation of the journey of the passengers and crew of an aircraft" in respect of which an unlawful act has been committed. If the amendment is adopted, the state would be in default if it did not permit the continuation of the journey of the passengers and the aircraft.

The third and last amendment increases the maximum penalty to a fine not exceeding $25,000, whereas in the original draft of the bill the amount was $10,000.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Senator Flynn: Is it anticipated that the Commons might pass this bill before the adjournment?

Senator Frith: I simply do not know.

Senator Flynn: So long as it does not disrupt our own schedule.

Senator Frith: Quite.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that we do now rise to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 3 o'clock this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1500)

At 3 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

EXTENSION OF Q & M PIPELINE TO HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before we were interrupted for a rather unusual royal assent, I was about to follow up with a supplementary to a question raised by the Honourable Senator Thériault. Perhaps I could say that I support the viewpoint put forward by the Honourable Senator Thériault, and would like to remind the Minister of State for Economic Development that we in the maritime provinces still think of ourselves as Canadians, though sometimes I wonder if he does. The Liberal platform in the last election was sort of a "Canadian first" platform, and I hope the honourable the minister will review that.

FEDERAL BUILDINGS

CONCESSION AT PLACE DU PORTAGE, HULL, QUEBEC

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? I think we on this side have been accommodating enough today. Perhaps you will put up with us for a minute or two.

Media reports last evening, particularly in the Ottawa Citizen, indicated that the government has been forced to turn the Canadian National Institute for the Blind into a corrective patronage project in Place du Portage in Hull. I really have no objection to the government's appealing to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, since I have a high regard for that organization. They work at a high level of efficiency, as opposed to this government, and when they agree to undertake a project they complete it—something that is foreign to this government.

Having consideration for the efficiency of the CNIB, would the government consider using that organization to replace the staff of the Prime Minister's Office and the majority of the cabinet?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may be wrong, but I thought I detected a partisan aspect to the question asked by the honourable senator. I want to say that there are none so blind as those who will not see.

Senator Flynn: You can say that again.

Senator Perrault: In my view, the honourable senator in his remarks has really been most unfair. He has made his judgments on the basis of fragmentary newspaper accounts. He should not wish for the worst, but the best, in matters of this kind.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, naturally I always wish the Leader of the Government the best. He needs it. I do not think, however, that the reports were as fragmentary as the honourable leader seems to believe them to be. I would hope that the government would have a look at the patronage pattern developed by certain cabinet ministers and the Honourable Minister for Hull. Before he departs for the summer vacation, without a private railway car, because the Canadian National cannot provide one to the Olympics, I hope the honourable the minister will agree to having a look at this situation.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice, but I am sure that in the ultimate, when the facts have become known, even the honourable senator will be reassured by the position of the government.

Senator Phillips: If so, it will be for the first time.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask what is really a supplementary question respecting the Garrison diversion? I apologize to my honourable friend the Leader of the Government in the Senate for being absent on other Senate business this morning, and I hope I may be allowed to ask him this question.

● (1505)

In the statement he made this morning with respect to the question of whether or not this new appropriation of funds for the dam would result in any harm to the ecology of the Manitoba water system, the honourable leader said that that would not be the case. He told us that an assurance to this effect, which was not conveyed in writing but, rather, was made orally by senior administrative representatives, was fully consistent with American policy, et cetera.

My problem is that I have every reason to believe that the supporters of the Garrison project in North Dakota do not know this and do not believe it. I would feel more comfortable if my honourable friend could tell me whether the minister who obtained this assurance orally was able to follow it up in a written fashion later on in order to make sure that there was a complete meeting of minds and understanding of the matter. Would the Leader of the Government inform this chamber as to whether such a confirmation of this written assurance was sought, and procured, by means of a letter from our government to the American government?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that inquiry will go forward and an attempt will be made to obtain additional information.

In relation to many issues affecting Canada and the United States, many of the attitudes in the United States, quite understandably, and many of the statements may be conditioned by the events which will transpire in November of this year. This has been the historical pattern in the past and perhaps this is the situation again this year.

The honourable senator has made a legitimate request, and an earnest effort will be made to obtain the facts.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend because he has raised precisely the point that is bothering me. I agree with what he says and, therefore, I am all the more keen to make sure that we nail this thing down as closely as we possibly can.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I have a supplementary question in connection with Senator Roblin's question of the leader a moment ago. This morning I asked a question pertaining to the Garrison project, and I appreciate the reply that was given.

I am not aware whether the International Joint Commission has made a report about this whole problem. I am sure that if such a report is available the leader could make it available to this chamber. Would he also make representations once again regarding the concern of Manitobans in this particular regard?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator makes an excellent point as usual. I will attempt to obtain that additional information.

Senator Flynn: The "as usual" was unnecessary.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am sorry I was momentarily out of the chamber on national and international business when the house leader answered my question about the establishment of a carrageen plant in Prince Edward Island. I want to thank him for that very concise answer; it is the best one he has given me since this session began.

I also want to commend the government for responding to a suggestion that I have been making for over 14 years. They have responded almost 100 per cent except that I did not want the plant to be established in Tignish; I wanted it to be located in the centre of Prince Edward Island, perhaps in Victoria.

Since one good turn deserves another, I would ask my honourable friend if he would give me an undertaking that when we return in September or October, he will give answers to my question of June 5 regarding disarmament; my question of June 10 regarding Haitian refugees; and my question of June 17 regarding aerospace.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can advise that researchers are busy at the present time gathering the information requested by Senator Macquarrie.

In relation to moss, may I say that this busy government gathers no moss, while, happily, the people of Prince Edward Island will shortly be able to gather Irish moss profitably.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT DECISION ON PREBUILD

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, this morning, at perhaps an inappropriate point in the proceedings, I asked a question concerning the southern portion of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline.

Both Mr. Blair and Mr. Daniel denied themselves vacations to appear before the National Finance Committee this morning. I might say, I have no interest in this matter. I merely feel we should walk in company with the House of Commons with respect to information on this matter. I am wondering whether there will be anything said in the House of Commons about the southern section of this project before the summer recess. Perhaps Senator Olson has something to say.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator's question relates, as I understand it, to the so-called prebuild or the southern section of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline. I am not sure that I can answer that part of the question related to whether or not any member of the House of Commons will have anything to say about it. What I said earlier today was that there will be another cabinet meeting at 5 o'clock this afternoon. Whether there is an announcement, either in this chamber—and this is where the minister responsible for the pipeline is—and/or in the House of Commons, will obviously depend on a decision being made by the cabinet.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC CANADA—PASSENGER AND FREIGHT FACILITIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, on July 9 I posed a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development regarding the terrible service that was being provided by VIA Rail and by CN Marine on the east coast. The minister at that time asked me to provide him with some information on the matter, and I have to date provided him with a small amount. Indeed, in a co-operative manner his office has phoned my office since, requesting further information on the matter. That information is being prepared at the moment and will follow to the minister as soon as possible.

As I am anxious to receive a reply to my question, I would ask the minister, once he has received that additional information, to forward any answers he has to me by mail.

On occasion, many people have been left waiting on platforms because they could not be accommodated on the trains, particularly when there have been large numbers going to the shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré.

So, I would ask the minister, once he has received that information, to send it to me in his usual kindly manner.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I shall, in my usual kindly manner and with dispatch, see that the honourable senator gets a letter on this matter, and perhaps it could be delivered by hand to his office here. If he is not here and we are so advised, we will send him a communication to make sure that he gets the information as expeditiously as possible.

INDUSTRY

EXTENSION OF SUBSIDIES TO SHIPBUILDING—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to reply to Senator Smith's question of July 15 regarding specific information relating to the shipyard order books in Atlantic Canada.

According to officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as of early June 1980, the last delivery dates on order books in Atlantic Canada shipyards are as follows:

Saint John Shipyards—July, 1981

Halifax Industries—November, 1981

Fergusson Industries—May, 1982

Georgetown Shipyards—October, 1980

Marystown Shipyards—Early 1982.

Honourable senators will note that I have not included a date for the St. John's shipyard, the reason being that the St. John's shipyard is involved in ship repair work rather than new vessel construction. Ship repair work is not affected by the rate of any subsidy for any new vessel construction. However, by way of assurance to Senator Smith, I am advised that the St. John's shipyard is operating at full capacity in ship repair and the outlook appears to be for an increase in activity rather than any lessening of the work that is done in that yard.

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Godfrey, I present the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 757)

Senator Lafond moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Paul C. Lafond, for Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 17, 1980

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its fifth report as follows:

[Senator Perrault.]

(Statutory Instruments No. 11)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee draws the attention of the Houses to SOR/72-263, Sale of Postage Stamps Regulations, now C.R.C. c. 1293.

2. Your Committee and its predecessors have since October 1975 sought to persuade the Post Office Department to amend section 14 of these Regulations which provides that a Postmaster may at any time cancel a licence to sell postage stamps. Your Committee is dissatisfied with this bare provision which affects licensees in an aspect of their businesses and livelihoods. No grounds are identified as warranting concellation of a licence. There is no requirement that reasons for cancellation be given to a licensee or that he be given any opportunity to make representations against the cancellation of his licence. In your Committee's judgment this is a violation of the rules of natural justice and makes the rights of licensees unduly dependent on unfettered administrative discretion.

3. It appears from the explanations given by the Post Office Department to your Committees predecessors that the informal practices of the Post Office, if always followed, would ensure that licences to sell postage stamps are cancelled only for legitimate commercial reasons, that licensees are informed of the reasons for cancellation and that they are given an opportunity to be heard in reply. Your Committee is, therefore, at a loss to understand why the Post Office Department has resisted so stoutly for so long the insertion in the Regulations of the grounds on which licences may be cancelled and the basic and easily expressed requirements of natural justice.

4. Your Committee's position was pointed out to the Postmaster General who stated in reply that he was confident that the established practice for cancelling licences to sell postage stamps provides sufficient guarantee for the licensees to be heard. He also stated that any citizen has the right to write to him on any subject regarding the postal service, including dissatisfaction with a decision made by an officer of his Department. This form of redress is inadequate. It does not ensure that licences are cancelled only for legitimate commercial reasons set out in the Regulations and that Postmasters' discretions are limited accordingly. Nor does it require that reasons be given to a licensee whose licence is cancelled; nor that his representations will be considered.

5. In seeking the insertion of basic safeguards in section 14 of the Regulations and the limitation of a Postmaster's discretion to cancel a licence, your Committee does not wish to interfere with the freedom of administrative action of the Post Office or the legitimate business or other grounds which might lead the Post Office to cancel a licence. It simply seeks to attach to the discretion to cancel a licence the safeguards of natural justice to the end that cancellation will take place for a proper purpose and be seen so to take place.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

FORT NELSON INDIAN RESERVE MINERALS REVENUE SHARING BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hayden, for the second reading of the Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues for the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve". (Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Nurgitz to allow this order to stand. We are hoping to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs today. It so happens that Senator Goldenberg, the chairman of that committee, will be unable to preside and, in his absence, Senator Donahoe will be taking the Chair. The next order stands in the name of Senator Donahoe, and if he is allowed to proceed with that order he will be able to preside at the meeting of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Thompson for second reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I do not have a reputation for brevity, but I hasten to assure you that on this occasion, and in the circumstances now prevailing, I shall indeed keep my remarks within a very narrow compass.

I would like first of all to congratulate Senator Thompson on the address which he gave us in moving second reading of this bill. It was an excellent address; it caught my interest and I followed it very closely. I must admit, however, that I did not have to follow it for a very long period of time to realize that his speech was addressed not so much to the bill or to its contents as it was to the overall question of unemployment insurance, how it is being administered, how it is being financed, how it is being operated, and whether or not it stands in need of an overall and in-depth review. He held forth the hope that such a review would proceed, and that from it there might in due course be an improvement in the system and an amendment to make it more responsive to the needs of the times, and more responsive to the original purposes for which this act was designed. He said that a complete overhaul of the act was required and not a band-aid approach.

With respect to the particular bill before us, I am not able to say whether it is a band-aid approach. Perhaps it should be more properly designated as a stand-pat approach, because the bill, which, as Senator Thompson pointed out, has only two operative clauses, really introduces very little novel material except, perhaps, a little bit to do with the question of how the finances and the financing of some portions of the legislation should be handled.

● (1530)

I hope that this bill is introduced really as a means of marking time to provide a breathing space in which the minister will be able to proceed with the promised review, because if it does not serve that purpose then it really does not mark a great deal in the way of progress.

I have to point out, and I am pleased to do so, that the only clause that really introduces anything new is the clause dealing with financing.

I ask honourable members to support this bill, particularly that clause, because, believe it or not, it is a survivor from the budget proposals that were brought in by the Clark government in December last.

I think it is entirely reasonable that, if the minister was without ideas of his own on how to improve the act, he should reach back into that budget and take from it something which he felt he could adopt and which he could put forward as something which we ought to support. I find it highly entertaining that we should be asked to sit here today to consider a provision of that budget which the honourable gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches in Parliament found so utterly and totally unacceptable and repugnant last December.

Senator Asselin: Touché!

Senator Donahoe: The other provision makes no change in the existing entrance requirement and as such deserves to be supported, if it is offered with a view to providing, as I have suggested, a breathing space for an all-out review of the existing act and its operations.

Accordingly, honourable senators, with those few comments I indicate that I am prepared to support the bill, and I ask honourable senators to join me in that support.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Thompson. I must explain first why I am asking it.

In December 1978, when the Unemployment Insurance Act was last amended, I was compelled to vote against the bill because I felt it would lead to great hardship for many Canadian families.

That measure required a person to work 20 hours in order to be eligible for benefits under the act. That was a quite tough provision. Seventy per cent of all part-time workers are women, and 20 per cent of all women in the labour force are part-time workers, and that provision would mean that a great many women would be forced by harsh necessity and economics to take full-time jobs which would necessitate many of them not being at home when their children came out of school.

In his able presentation, Senator Thompson did not mention this section, which I feel should be repealed. I had thought that certainly I would be able to vote for this bill tonight, but I had to change my mind, when I did not hear Senator Thompson say anything about hours.

Senator Thompson, what is the problem? Was I mistaken in thinking that that was going to be changed?

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, if I may I will first reply to Senator Donahoe. I will start by saying that in the past—

Senator Asselin: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Thompson: Yes, I am closing the debate.

Senator Grosart: Surely you are answering a question.

Senator Asselin: I believe he is closing the debate at the same time.

Senator Thompson: I will do both, if that is acceptable.

● (1535)

The Hon. the Speaker: That means that the Honourable Senator Thompson will close the debate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Thompson: I would first say to Senator Donahoe that I welcome him as one who obviously provides great strength to the other side. In the past, by some coincidence, Senator Smith always seemed to be the speaker for the opposition when I presented a bill. They both have had long experience in the maritimes and are close associates. I recognize the kindness of both of them, although it included a little sharp political thrust now and again, which in the Senate is good.

Senator Donahoe had mentioned the stand-pat approach and marking time. That is exactly the purpose of not having further substantive amendments. The minister does indeed want to follow up on his two predecessors, one of whom was, of course, the Honourable Ron Atkey, and the other the Honourable Bud Cullen. He recognizes the need for a very full review, so he does not want to move any further at this time with any amendments other than those he feels are absolutely necessary.

I would be the first to admit that out of the darkness, in the days when the Conservatives presented their budget, there came a little gleam of light, and we are glad to give recognition to it. I see that Senator Donahoe's eyes are lighting up with satisfaction at that.

In reply to Senator Bird's question, I should first clarify that changes to the minimum insurable amount took place by regulation, so it was not required to be part of this bill, which is, of course, an amendment to legislation.

I apologize for not mentioning that the minister, when presenting the amendments, did go into the minimum insurability aspects. Because I am now fortunate—which I was not a few months ago—to again be a member of the government party I have the advantage of having the briefing notes on minimum insurability. Perhaps I might read some parts of these, because they describe it far better than I could. As a result of an amendment to the unemployment insurance regulations, and effective January 1981, workers will be included in insurable employment if their work with an employer involved either earnings of at least 20 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings—there is a choice of two—or working a minimum of 15 hours per week.

I know that Senator Bird will take much satisfaction with that, because I recall the debate on Bill C-14 in 1979. Indeed, another distinguished senator is looking at me right now, as is Senator Roblin, who also referred to the matter in connection with another bill. Although I do not think he would have gone as far as Senator Bird in that debate he did propose amendments which he considered might overcome the discrimination against women. So they both may take some satisfaction that this amendment has been introduced.

Why has the amendment been introduced? Before 1979 individuals were covered under the unemployment insurance program if they earned either the lesser of one fifth of the maximum weekly insurable earnings or 20 times the provincial minimum hourly wage. In 1979 the basis of insuring was changed from earnings to an hourly amount, except for employees paid by commission, and piece workers who are required to have earnings equivalent to 30 per cent of the maximum insurable earnings—a weekly minimum of $87 in 1980. The large majority of workers, however, are required to work 20 hours a week for one employer—I am talking about 1979—in order to be covered by the program.

Since the change in January 1979, to which I was referring when I mentioned Senator Roblin and Senator Bird, a number of specific problems and anomalies have been brought to the attention of the commission. Most fundamentally affected and concerned have been women, who have criticized this measure. In fact, the previous change did have a much more negative impact on women, since most part-time workers were women. Changing work patterns are such that many women are entering the labour force to assume permanent part-time positions.

● (1540)

I was looking at the figures in this connection, which reveal facts that Senator Bird brought out by means of another form of statistics, and which suggest that one in four women are part-time workers, while one in 17 men are in part-time work. This was a large group that was excluded, and I think that all of us can take satisfaction from this amendment. I apologize again for not mentioning that, but it came about in the form of a regulation, and therefore would not have been part of this bill.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask a question of the honourable senator. Would he clarify this a little bit further by giving us an example of what unemployment insurance benefits would be received by, say, a woman working part-time 15 hours a week at the minimum wage of just under $4 per hour?

Senator Thompson: Well, Senator Molson, I am probably not as good at mathematics as you. I think I would do better, if you do not mind, by saying I will get the answer for you. I was trying to do it in my head, but I do not trust my abilities in that direction.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FORT NELSON INDIAN RESERVE MINERALS REVENUE SHARING BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for second reading of Bill C-26, to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, before proceeding, perhaps the sponsor of this bill might let us know whether he has had an opportunity to obtain answers to the questions that were asked during his speech yesterday.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to those questions. The first one is an answer to the question asked by Senator Williams concerning moneys going into the government trust fund. The answer I have been furnished with is that all funds received must first go into the consolidated revenue fund. Following that they can be dispersed in accordance with sections 64 and 66 of the Indian Act.

In the case of Fort Nelson, the band plays an important part in deciding how the money will be spent. Sections 64 and 66 are similar. The minister may authorize expenditures, with the consent of the band council, that will promote the general progress and welfare of the band.

If I understand that correctly, it means that providing the expenditures promote the general progress and welfare of the band the council makes the decision, and the minister is then authorized to make the expenditures.

Senator Connolly asked about the population and the membership of the band. As of May 1, 1980, the population of the Fort Nelson band was 291, which is very close to what Senator Williams told us. I think he said it was 300.

The third question was asked by Senator Connolly, and was about third parties. I have discussed this with Senator Connolly in the meantime. As was indicated at that time, as far as the agreement is concerned, there is really no third party. The province kept the mineral rights to itself when the land was transferred, and subsequently the province has contracted with oil companies to extract the gas. Prior to the signing of the agreement the province kept all of the moneys that might have normally come to the band had the mineral rights come under the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada.

If I may pause there, that would relate to a question I was discussing with Senator Williams during the adjournment. The question was: What happened to money that accrued prior to the time of the agreement? In accordance with this answer, that was kept separate for distribution pursuant to the agreement.

To continue, the agreement with British Columbia shares 50 per cent of the revenue with the band, the other 50 per cent being kept by the province.

The last question was asked by the Honourable Senator Guay. No clause in the agreement specifically safeguards the descendants, for that is not its purpose. This kind of concern, or responsibility, is dealt with in the normal framework of the Department of Indian Affairs. It would be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act.

Those are the answers I have been provided with, honourable senators.

Senator Nurgitz: Thank you. Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate Senator Frith for his excellent presentation yesterday, and, indeed, for the answers to the various questions asked following his presentation.

I think, when one looks at the overall picture, the governments of both Canada and British Columbia ought to be commended for taking, notwithstanding some criticisms of the bill, what certainly ought to be considered a step in the right direction. I say that while certainly wanting to reserve certain comments about the bill.

Time and again we—and by "we" I mean non-native people—tend to complain that the Indian people ought to learn to govern their own affairs, and I am suggesting, honourable senators, that this seems to be an example of Indian people taking an initiative towards doing just that. I think they ought to be commended as well.

The member of the House of Commons in whose constituency the Fort Nelson Indian band is situated, in speaking in the other place to this bill, said that the band had already proceeded with numerous recommendations with respect to investment management, and I raise that specifically in the light of the question put by Senator Guay yesterday. While no specifics were spelled out in the speech by the member of the other place, certainly it is implied that a lot of thought has already gone into proper management and investment, and that one may expect that future generations of the Fort Nelson Indian band will be protected and—I hope I am not reading too much into this—will be the recipients of some of those moneys.

Many of us, both in this chamber and in the other place, have no doubt heard of the objections made by various organizations. This bill seems to be a bit of a focal point for several groups. I am thinking of the National Indian Brotherhood, the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs, and so on, who, it being known that I would speak today, made certain representations. I expect that if this bill goes to committee we will be hearing others on this bill, more in connection with its principle than against the Fort Nelson people getting what they are entitled to.

● (1550)

There is a question that this bill does not recognize, and that is: Who, indeed, are the owners of the resources? It spells out that the band receives money, but there is some complaint that it wants to own the resources and not just receive money. There is a question as to the title of land, and matters of that nature.

I am suggesting that this matter ought to be referred to committee so that one may hear these comments. I understand arrangements are being made for this bill to be referred to committee. I am not suggesting for a moment that there is validity or otherwise to any comment.

Senator Connolly raised an interesting point yesterday about third parties. A matter that concerns me is that nowhere, either in the agreement or in the bill, is there any suggestion that the Fort Nelson Indian band can go to arbitration. Honourable senators, since the band is what we are dealing with and what we are trying to protect, I do not see, in this overall picture, a method of dealing with a grievance, if there is one. If they cannot convince the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to speak on their behalf, I am afraid that they are out of luck and out of court. That, too, we could perhaps have an opportunity to discuss a little more fully in committee.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

In spite of these objections and, I am sure, others that this group would like to make, the people of the Fort Nelson Indian band appear to have had a long struggle. The British Columbia government seems to have a record in terms of recognition of Indian rights which trails most other provinces. What I am really, in essence, saying is that the Fort Nelson Indian band is anxious to proceed with this agreement. They have worked hard and long to get it. They have had what appears to be good legal advice, and I do not think we ought to stand in their way.

Having regard to the history of this fight to get this far and the lack of recognition by their provincial government, I think, honourable senators, we ought to give this bill favourable consideration, subject to the comments I have made.

I am recommending, therefore, that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for more careful consideration. I am assuming that the committee can meet this afternoon.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I should like to put on record the matter of alienation of certain rights to certain resources that are rightfully owned by the Fort Nelson band. How and when did the Province of British Columbia obtain rights to retain certain resources on Indian reserves?

An Indian reserve is land set aside in accordance with the BNA Act for the use and the benefit of a band, wherever that band is. There appears to be a lack of proper consideration by the Government of Canada in that it did not carry out its duty.

The Fort Nelson band entered into a treaty with Canada on August 15, 1910, under Treaty Eight. If my memory serves me correctly, Treaty Eight came into effect in the city of Winnipeg, or in that area, in 1890. Several Indian bands have entered into negotiations to come under that treaty.

My point is that if the Government of Canada had carried out its responsibility in the matter of the Fort Nelson band governing itself to the extent that the treaty allows it, then British Columbia would not have had the right to retain certain non-renewable resources.

As a result of this action by British Columbia, the Government of Canada should have seen to it that the rights of the Fort Nelson band were protected, but the band has lost 50 per cent of its potential wealth. The province will now take 50 per cent, which means 50 per cent less to the Fort Nelson Band.

In connection with retaining revenues from resources on Indian reserves, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development normally retains 50 per cent, but from my own experience in the past, it is most difficult to withdraw any of that 50 per cent.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, the committee will meet immediately in room 256-S. I invite those members of the committee present to proceed to that room for the purpose of carrying out the instruction of the Senate respecting Bill C-26.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS BILL, 1980

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laird, for the second reading of the Bill C-4, intituled: "An Act respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes"—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have only a few things to say on this bill, and it may be useful if, before I do so, Senator Buckwold were given an opportunity to reply to some of the questions that were asked yesterday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, at the outset let me thank Senator Flynn for giving me this opportunity to respond to the questions raised in connection with this bill. What I have to say may have some influence on Senator Flynn's later remarks—remarks which, naturally, we look forward to hearing.

To ensure that I give accurate responses to the questions asked, officials of the department have prepared some notes for me.

Senator Asselin: Again!

Senator Buckwold: Again, yes. I can now provide accurate responses to the questions raised by honourable senators.

A number of questions were raised during the course of debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-4, and I propose to deal with them now. Several references were made in relation to the extent to which this bill authorizes the exercise of ministerial discretion. In this regard, particular reference was made to the use of regulations for making changes in the schedules to the bill.

Perhaps I might be permitted to deal with the schedules first, following which I shall refer more generally to the issue of the ministerial discretion.

Bill C-4 has four schedules, and the Governor in Council, may, by regulation, add to any of the schedules and may delete from three of them—Schedules I, III and IV. Schedule I provides that the properties of certain crown corporations may be included in grants paid under this legislation; that is to say, they may be lumped in with properties of government departments. At the moment, only one body, the National Research Council, is listed. However, other bodies could be added, an example being the proposed new Canada Post Corporation.

The effect on municipalities of the exercise of discretion in respect of Schedule I should be negligible, because all crown corporations would be required under the act to follow certain guidelines in paying grants in lieu of taxes, and these guidelines will require each crown corporation to pay grants in lieu of taxes on a basis at least as generous as that set out in the bill for departmental property.

In the specific case of the National Research Council, which was referred to, grants are paid on all of its properties. In relation to those properties in the city of Ottawa, the grants are paid by the Department of Public Works under the Municipal Grants Act; those elsewhere in Canada are paid by the National Research Council under its own authority. While this is an unusual arrangement, it is one that goes back many years, so it was decided to leave it undisturbed at the present time. That is the reason for the special reference to the National Research Council in Ottawa.

Schedule II, essentially, elaborates upon the definition of a category of real property that is excluded from grants. This category is generally referred to as "structures." The concept of a structure is difficult to define, and the purpose of Schedule II is to give clarity to the definition contained in paragraph (k) of subclauses 2(2) of the bill by citing examples. Any additions to this schedule would simply be for the purpose of providing greater clarity.

Schedules III and IV provide a listing of the crown corporations which are to be governed by guidelines concerning grants in lieu of taxes. These guidelines are intended to cover all crown corporations. However, new corporations will be created in the future and others will be wound up or sold. It is therefore essential to keep these schedules up-to-date, and this will be done by means of the regulations.

I should note that subclause 8(3) of the bill makes provision for prepublication in the Canada Gazette of any regulation that the Governor in Council proposes to make. The purpose of this provision is to give interested parties an opportunity to make representations to the minister about regulations before they go into effect. This provision applies to new regulations and to any subsequent changes in regulations.

More generally, Bill C-4 contains ministerial discretion because crown property is not taxable and the payments which are made are ex gratia. As a consequence, two of the key determinations of a real property tax grant—property value and effective rate—rest upon ministerial discretion. Thus, the definition of each of these terms in the bill contains the expression "in the opinion of the Minister." This is unchanged from the existing act.

While the minister has this discretion, he is directed by the act to use it in specific ways to ensure that grants are fair and equitable. Thus, he is required to value federal property "as if it were taxable property," and to use the same rate of tax in calculating a grant that would be applicable if federal property were taxable property.

I think we should understand that completely. The federal government has certainly been absolutely fair in any of the relationships it has with the taxing authorities of municipal governments.

The exercise of ministerial discretion appears to have worked well in these key areas. There have been relatively few disagreements. While municipalities in some cases have received less than they have applied for, much the same is true for the private sector, because assessment appeals are often successful. There is little reason to believe that the exercise of ministerial discretion has reduced grants below what they would be if matters were settled through the courts. Nevertheless, the process that I have described has been the subject of criticism in Parliament on the ground that it is wrong in principle and that some form of appeal procedure should be provided for.

The Minister of Public Works recognized this criticism in the course of discussion on Bill C-4 in the House of Commons Committee on National Resources and Public Works. At the last meeting of that committee in connection with Bill C-4 he gave the following undertaking:

> I undertake, Mr. Chairman, to set up a special study group to review the appeals process issue which has been raised by a number of witnesses. A team would consist of senior members of my department and of Justice, who during their deliberations would consult with the provinces and with municipal representatives. The purposes of such an examination would be to look into the advantages and disadvantages of an appeal system, to exercise alternative ways in which appeals might be handled, and to consider the implications of an appeals procedure in the process followed in evaluating applications for grants.
> I would ask this team to report back to me within 12 months with their analysis and their recommendations. On receipt of the report, I am prepared to seek approval from my Cabinet colleagues on any changes to legislation that I think would be appropriate arising from the task force or the group recommendations to me.

In response to a question, the minister indicated further that this report would be made public.

A question was also asked in this house as to whether various types of municipal bodies in Newfoundland could qualify for a grant. The general answer to this, as I said yesterday, is that grants may be made to any local body that levies a real property tax. Grants are paid to taxing authorities, and the definition of "taxing authority" in the bill is:

> —any municipality, province, municipal or provincial board, commission, corporation or other authority that levies and collects a real property tax . . . pursuant to an Act of the legislature of a province—

• (1610)

In conclusion, a question was asked as to whether Air Canada would pay property taxes on a basis that would be the same for CP Air, and whether the Bank of Canada would pay property taxes on a basis that would be the same for commercial banks. The answer to those questions is what I gave yesterday, that these two bodies would pay on the same basis as CP Air and commercial banks respectively.

Honourable senators, I think my statement has responded to the questions that have been raised in some detail.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Buckwold for the additional information he has given us. At one time, I did encounter this problem of grants in lieu of taxes from more senior levels of government to municipalities. In fact, senior levels of government have not been giving grants for a long time.

Formerly, it was thought that in matters pertaining to Crown property in right of the province or of the federal government, taxes should not be paid to municipalities. But that was a time when municipal services were not as extensive or as costly. In the last 50 years, municipal services have increased considerably and their cost has become a very heavy burden for municipal corporations.

Consequently, it did not seem right that some municipalities and, more precisely, ratepayers of these municipalities, should be called upon to provide services to senior governments when some other municipalities did not have to do so. Thus, it is a matter of justice and sharing of service charges which brought about legislation concerning grants in lieu of taxes.

Obviously, federal as well as provincial capitals or larger centres where federal services take up a lot of space, or in other words where the federal and provincial governments own all sorts of buildings, are municipalities which are the most concerned.

We have witnessed quite an evolution in my view. However, it seems that this matter of discretion which we hold so dear is somewhat outdated. In the past, it was fine to say that it was left to the minister's or to the government's discretion to authorize or to refuse a grant, to take something into account or not. But, in view of the current tax regime, this is an outmoded practice because of the various services in our society. Consequently, there is no reason why the same regime would not apply to governments as well as to any other ratepayer.

I know that briefs were submitted when this bill was discussed in committee in the House of Commons. I remember one brief in particular which had been very well prepared and submitted by the Union des municipalités de la province de Québec—I think that its president, the Mayor of Sherbrooke, Mr. Jacques O'Brady, had signed that report. I believe that the minister had then promised to consider the matter of appeals to which Senator Buckwold alluded a little while ago. He had promised to study this matter and also to look into some very realistic and practical suggestions made in the brief submitted by the Union des municipalités de la province de Québec and eventually to amend, improve the legislation and adapt it to the circumstances we now know.

I for one see no reason not to tax Her Majesty in right of the federal or provincial Crown for the same things as the ordinary ratepayer. I cannot see the difference, if there is one.

In my view, this legislation should tend to put everyone on the same level, the Crown as well as any other ratepayer with respect to contributing to the budgets of municipalities.

Of course, there is no need to suggest that this bill be referred to a committee. It has been studied in the other place. As we know, this bill cannot be amended at this time. Moreover, it is already an improvement. However, we must single out what must eventually be amended to ensure better justice and equality for municipalities with respect to federal property.

Furthermore, equitable and fair federal legislation will necessarily prompt similar provincial legislation.

Therefore, with this reservation, I think this bill can pass second reading and, eventually, third reading.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Flynn for his usually capable comments on this bill, and certainly every member of this house would agree with him that it is desirable that the federal government pay taxes on its properties the same as any private taxpayer would pay to the local municipality in which that property is located. I think I can safely say that this does apply in all instances. There are some questionable areas where wharves, docks and certain properties that we call structures in the act are not covered in this case because they do not require any municipal services. There could be some argument about that; I do not know.

The basic principle of the act is really to achieve what Senator Flynn has pointed out to us, to make it much more equitable than it has been in the past. As I say, with some of the comments made by the minister which have been recognized by Senator Flynn, with rights of appeal on assessment and this kind of thing, and ministerial discretion, you will see a great improvement in the application of this particular act to meet the varied objectives that have been stated by Senator Flynn.

That is the only comment I have except to say that local governments across the country, I am sure, will be looking forward to the passage of this bill so that they can receive substantial amounts of money running into many millions, and I know those funds will be most welcome to hard-pressed municipalities.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read a third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which was presented Tuesday, July 15, 1980.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I regret to have to put on record that the report is not unanimously adopted.

When the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration considered the recommendation of the subcommittee, there was a division indicating rather sharp differences.

The problem lies not in the person recommended by the committee for the office of Clerk Assistant. Rather, a principle of significance, in my view, has been overlooked by the subcommittee, namely that the office of Clerk Assistant of the Senate requires language qualifications that the person recommended does not have. In view of the principle laid down in the Official Languages Act, and in view especially of the report made by the Commissioner of Official Languages on the Senate, it is my belief that the recommendation made by the subcommittee and the recommendation by the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee are in error.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Martial Asselin: On division.

Motion agreed to and report adopted on division.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel Riley moved the second reading of Bill C-18, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

He said: Honourable senators, before I make my comments on this bill, I should point out for the benefit of new senators who may be unfamiliar with the history of this bill that it was first introduced in May 1978 by the then Minister of Transport. At that time it died on the order paper. It was introduced again on November 29, 1979, and again died on the order paper. It is now before us as Bill C-18.

I might say that the necessity for this bill was first identified by His Honour the Speaker in 1974. I am pleased to see him sitting in the Chair today to witness the possible passage of the bill.

The objectives of the bill are as follows:

> To lessen the number, and reduce the impact of incidents and accidents involving dangerous goods in transit by enabling the Governor in Council to promulgate regulations relating to safety marks, safety requirements, safety standards and other related matters;
>
> To discourage contraventions of the act or regulations by imposing appropriate penalties in the form of fines and imprisonment;
>
> To deter any possible disregard for the act or regulations by providing for evidence of civil or financial responsibility and allowing for the recovery of costs incurred by the Crown in taking emergency measures;
>
> To police the act and regulations by establishing, in collaboration with the provinces, a national system of inspection; and
> To encourage the development of safe practices, such as improved packaging and engineering standards and employee training programs and by permitting or sponsoring research and experimentation.

The act serves as an umbrella for the development and evolution of safety-related regulations and is designed to allow for maximum flexibility in the fact or rapid changes in science and technology.

It establishes a single set of regulations dealing with all modes of transport and all types of goods that present danger in transport to resolve the confusion arising out of the multiplicity of often inconsistent regulations that now exist and facilitates intermodal and international transport.

Responsibility for complying with the regulations will be clearly defined by them. Penalties for offences under the act are up to $50,000 for a first offence and up to $100,000 for each subsequent offence on summary conviction, or imprisonment up to two years on indictment.

Penalties for contravention or failure to comply with the act are $10,000 on summary conviction, or imprisonment for up to one year on indictment.

• (1630)

Penalties for offences designated by the regulations as "ticketing" offences will be established by regulation up to a maximum of $1,000.

The act further provides several ways in which the Crown can be compensated for damage to the public caused by discharges, emissions or escapes of dangerous goods. Any person involved in the transportation of dangerous goods may be required by the minister to provide evidence of financial responsibility. Any such person who is not within the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts may be required to appoint an agent who is within that jurisdiction—again establishing financial responsibility—and any person who fails or refuses a request by an inspector to take steps to comply with the regulations, or who unlawfully causes a discharge of dangerous goods, may be sued by Her Majesty in the right of Canada for recovery of any costs reasonably incurred in preventing or mitigating damage caused by the defendant's acts or omissions.

On the inspection, a national network of inspectors under the overall control of the Department of Transport will have powers to enter premises and means of transport intended for use in connection with dangerous goods, open and inspect packages and containers, remove samples and examine records for the purpose of supervising compliance with the act and regulations.

Inspectors will, in addition, have the power to stop movement of dangerous goods, or refuse them entry into Canada, seize any goods, packages or means of transport presenting an imminent danger, and destroy or dispose of abandoned or deteriorated dangerous goods.

The qualifications and training of inspectors will vary according to the function which they have been designated to perform, such as carrier control, manufacturing control, operational control or enforcement of special regulations relating to special kinds of dangerous substances, such as inflammable liquids, radioactive materials and infectious substances.

Wherever possible, use will be made of existing inspecting agencies, including police and fire services, by agreement with provincial government departments or other federal departments or agencies, such as the Atomic Energy Control Board, the Explosives Branch of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Customs and Excise Branch of the Department of National Revenue.

The act provides for reports to be made of all discharges, emissions and escapes of dangerous goods for the purpose of statistical research into possible factors contributing to these incidents with a view to drafting regulations or taking other measures to diminish them.

The act enables the minister to undertake, alone or with others, programs of technical research, and to publish the results of such research and any other material that may be of use in the education and training of technicians, employees, emergency response personnel or the general public.

The act enables the minister to issue special permits for the handling or transporting of dangerous goods other than in compliance with the legislation in order to enable manufacturers and shippers to evolve new methods and procedures that will improve the safety of their operations.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I say to Senator Riley and other senators opposite that we on this side of the chamber appreciate the importance and need for prompt passage of this legislation, whose object is to improve the standards of safety involved in the transportation of dangerous goods in Canada. The Mississauga disaster, which could easily have been the Mississauga tragedy, focused the attention of the country on this matter.

The bill before us is essentially the bill that was introduced in the other place by the Honourable Don Mazankowski as Minister of Transport under the previous government, although historically it is appropriate to point out, as Senator Riley has already done, that the legislation really had its genesis under our present Speaker when he served the Government of Canada as the Minister of Transport, and, indeed, I believe it would be correct to say that he can claim credit for organizing the required degree of co-operation between the three levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—and also the co-operation of the transportation industry, in order to create the framework which was essential if a practical piece of legislation was to emerge.

Many changes were made to the bill during its consideration in committee in the other place, which I am sure are for the better; but I am also sure that on the basis of experience, in its implementation, further changes will be required.

This bill breaks much new ground and imperfections will undoubtedly surface. We on this side therefore support the principal objectives of this bill and are pleased to co-operate in its speedy passage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

An Hon. Senator: When?

Senator Riley: This day.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the Transport and Communications Committee plans to study this bill and report it later today. It wants the opportunity to look at the bill for further study of the act and certain regulations that may be promulgated under the act during the summer pursuant. It plans to deal with the subject matter of the bill, with the government's full co-operation, later in the fall. Therefore it is suggested that the bill be referred to committee for a short meeting now for the purpose of discussing how to deal with the subject matter of the bill, and the regulations, if the bill becomes law. The chairman of the committee, Senator Smith, might wish to add something to what I have said. So far as the government is concerned, this is the purpose of referring the bill to committee for report later today.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said is in conformity with what I have been told, and I believe it to be correct. I should say that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport has been alert enough to send a letter which perhaps I should read now. It will illustrate what is in the minds of those who hope that the bill will be dealt with by the committee this afternoon. I should also say that I am not sure that every member of the committee will agree with the proposed action, but that is something we can find out. The letter is dated today and is addressed to the chairman and members of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. It reads:

> In view of the fact that there is urgency to enact Bill C-18 before Parliament takes leave for summer recess, and that this bill will serve as the basis for subsequent regulations to be drafted and advertised, I solicit the concurrence of your committee with the bill as passed in the House of Commons.
>
> The Hon. J. L. Pepin, Minister of Transport, has authorized me, as his Parliamentary Secretary, to give you the assurance of his full co-operation and that of the members of his department for your review of those regulations and the subject matter of Bill C-18 when you resume your sessions in the fall.
>
> I am sincerely grateful to you and your colleagues for your earnest co-operation in this matter,
>
> Yours sincerely,
>
> Robert Bockstael, M.P.
> St. Boniface

I should also say that this morning the committee met to consider Bill S-7, following which I raised the question of whether or not it wished to have a meeting this afternoon should this bill be referred to it. The decision of the committee was, without committing itself to whatever action it would take, that it would be desirable to have a meeting this afternoon if the Senate referred this bill to committee. Therefore tentative arrangements are in hand for the Parliamentary Secretary and some senior officials of the department to be in attendance in one of the committee rooms. They are probably on their way now. The committee will then hear this letter officially from the Parliamentary Secretary and can ask such questions and take such action as it wishes. Of course, we are entirely in the hands of the Senate as to whether it is so referred.

● (1640)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps the position we are in, then, is that of having to decide whether, in view of the undertaking, the bill should be referred to the committee, or whether the undertaking is satisfactory without the reference. I believe that since plans have been made, and the implication is that it will be more satisfactory if we hear the undertaking in evidence before the committee, the best course would be to refer the bill to the committee for report later.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. G. I. Smith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Smith Committee: Honourable senators, the Transport and Communications Committee will meet immediately in room 356-S.

IRANIAN ECONOMIC SANCTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill C-31, to provide for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to introduce for second reading Bill C-31, an act which provides for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Honourable senators will not need to be reminded of the continuing plight of the 52 American embassy staff members who remain hostages in Iran, and of the efforts which have been made by the international community since last November to secure their release. Canada has played a full part in these efforts, not only because of the humanitarian considerations involved but because the government believes that the hostage crisis represents a fundamental challenge to the centuries-old evolution of orderly relations among states. Diplomatic immunity in particular is an essential element in the development of a community of peaceful and co-operating nation-states. The violation of this immunity, in this case condoned by a government after being perpetrated by a militant group, should therefore be of great concern to all states, and especially to smaller powers whose security and welfare must heavily depend on the vindication of international law. The fact that many Iranians may feel a sense of grievance about the past, or that the new Iranian government is even now still only being set up, cannot excuse or justify such a threat to international order.

The Canadian assessment that the hostage crisis represents a grave breach of international law has been fully shared by the international community. In December the U.N. Security Council passed without dissent two resolutions urging respect for international law and demanding the release of the hostages. The second of these, passed on December 31, 1979, in fact called for sanctions against Iran if that country did not release the hostages. The intent of this resolution was eventually frustrated when the Soviet Union on January 13, 1980, vetoed a subsequent American-sponsored draft resolution setting out specific sanctions to be applied against Iran. The Soviet veto, however, could not and did not negate the condemnation by the international community of the hostage-taking. That condemnation has furthermore been reinforced by the International Court of Justice which, first in an interim decision in December, and then in a final judgment in May, ordered Iran to restore the embassy to the U.S.A. and to release the hostages. These unequivocal judgments by both the United Nations and the International Court of Justice fully justify the application of sanctions against Iran.

Honourable senators may recall that after the Soviet veto, the Americans requested a number of friendly governments, including Canada, to implement the sanctions set out in the United Nations draft resolution as if the latter had passed. Then, in late January, it began to appear as if a more cohesive and pragmatic government was emerging in Iran. At the same time the United Nations began intensive efforts to mediate the dispute, and for several weeks a U.N.-sponsored commission visited Tehran. Unfortunately, this commission had to suspend its work after several weeks, having failed to make progress on securing the release of the hostages. About the same time Ayatollah Khomeini confirmed that the new and still unconstituted Parliament would have to decide the hostages' fate, thus indefinitely delaying a solution to the crisis.

● (1650)

These adverse developments prompted President Carter, in early April, to order comprehensive American sanctions against Iran and to request like-minded countries to take supporting action. The decision by the EEC and Japan on April 22, and by Canada on April 23, to impose a series of limited measures against Iran was in response to President Carter's appeal. At the same time these countries, including Canada, stated that if by May 17 there was no decisive progress in effecting the hostages' release, further measures against Iran would be taken. Since no such progress was made, the EEC countries and Japan decided on May 18 to implement the kind of measures contained in the vetoed draft Security Council resolution. On May 22 the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Canada was taking parallel steps by placing controls on the export of goods to Iran and by introducing into Parliament the legislation before us today.

Throughout the events I have been describing the government has been concerned to amplify as much as possible the message of international disapproval reaching the Iranians, and to emphasize to them the cost in terms of growing isolation of persisting in such a major violation of international law. For this reason we have sought to concert our actions, both in substance and timing, with those of like-minded countries such as the member states of the EEC, Japan and Australia. It is for this reason that the Canadian Parliament is being asked to give swift approval to this bill, which will put us in a position to implement, as our friends have already done, the range of measures contained in the vetoed Security Council resolution.

There are important political as well as legal reasons why Canada should support economic sanctions against Iran. They are, after all, a practical way of reassuring the Americans that the international community is prepared to show solidarity in a situation which is deeply frustrating to them and, indeed, is intolerable for all law-abiding states. The Canadian government firmly believes that a solution to the hostage situation will only be found through patience, imagination and giving the internal process in Iran time to evolve to the point where it is possible for pragmatic leaders to negotiate their release. In the meantime, however, it is unrealistic to expect Americans to accept the present situation alone and unsupported. We must demonstrate to the Americans, as well as to the Iranians, that the international community is not powerless and is concerned that all countries, even superpowers, should be able to put their trust in the vindication of international law rather than in force. Economic sanctions, in addition to their value in adding to the pressures on Iran to release the hostages, serve this symbolic purpose.

As a final consideration I should emphasize that these measures do not signify any hostility on the part of the Canadian government toward the Iranian government or people, or any wish to intervene in Iranian internal affairs. Canada has always supported the independence and territorial integrity of Iran, and we continue to do so. As soon as the hostage crisis is resolved, we will be looking for opportunities to renew our relations with that country.

Turning to the nature of the legislation now before us, the Security Council resolution proposed by the U.S.A. asked that all states impose economic and diplomatic sanctions against Iran. As I indicated earlier, we have already put in place an embargo on the export of goods to Iran, and we have greatly reduced diplomatic contacts with Iran.

Existing Canadian legislation does not permit Canada to impose the other economic measures called for by the vetoed U.N. resolution, and it is therefore proposed that the legislation now before us be enacted. It mirrors the resolution and will give to the government the powers necessary to implement the resolution as far as Canada is concerned—powers that would have been available under the United Nations Act had the Soviet Union not cast its veto.

We recognize that the bill is exceptional, and safeguards have therefore been built in. Orders made under the bill will be submitted to Parliament. The bill will expire one year after the day it is assented to, and any order to prolong it will also be submitted to Parliament.

In conclusion, I would emphasize that the government hopes that the need for, and hence duration of this legislation, will be shortlived. We hope that the new Iranian Parliament will be able to turn its attention to the hostage situation without further delay. With their country facing challenges at home and abroad, more and more Iranians may come to see the hostage crisis as an obstacle to the solution of these problems. Once the hostages are released safely, our government will move quickly to repeal this legislation and will be ready to renew the traditionally friendly relations between Canada and Iran.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise briefly first of all to congratulate Senator Haidasz for his clarity in introducing this bill which should have serious consequences on the international level.

I should like, however, to indicate that our government had to face these difficulties and problems and assume its responsibilities in November and December of last year, as well as in January of this year. Honourable senators will recall that the Right Hon. Prime Minister had asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to go to New York and support publicly in the Security Council the United Nations resolution calling for sanctions against Iran, a resolution which was adopted in January 1980. As Senator Haidasz observed, there was of course the veto by the Soviet Union, which made it impossible for the United Nations to enforce these economic sanctions among its member countries.

You will remember also that the Honourable Flora MacDonald had visited the NATO countries and asked the ministers of foreign affairs of the NATO countries to propose a series of measures, and economic sanctions not, as stated by Senator Haidasz, to punish the Iranian government or its people, but to remind that country and others which are members of the international community that when a basic principle of international law is not enforced, namely, the inviolability of foreign territory such as embassies, it will be difficult for several countries to appoint responsible individuals to represent their country abroad.

It is obviously in the first place to make the Iranians and their government realize that one cannot with impunity take foreigners as hostages and keep them long enough to attain purposes which could surely be attained otherwise.

The opposition supports, of course, the principle of this bill. We also hope that the economic sanctions which Canada is ready to take against Iran will lend moral support to our American friends who are facing a rather complicated and difficult international situation and will also show to Iran that one cannot with impunity violate, as I said earlier, those principles of international law.

I hope that those economic sanctions which we are taking in co-operation with our allies will cause the Iranian government to reflect, and that it will free the hostages as quickly as possible so that Canada may restore diplomatic and friendly relations which have always existed with Iran.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to participate in this debate. I appreciated the portion of Senator Asselin's speech which I heard. I regret to say that I did not hear the first part because I was again called away on important public duty.

I have some misgivings about a measure of this kind. I would be happier if someone could point out to me and indicate where, in the course of human history, economic boycotts have been an effective instrument in international politics. I am old enough to remember, without looking at my history books, what efforts were made to curtail Mussolini's fascists as they overwhelmed Ethiopia. I watched year after year rigid economic sanctions being imposed on Rhodesia. Fourteen years thereafter that country not only continued, but its gross national product had increased. All sorts of economic weaponry have been thrust against South Africa. If that regime experiences difficulty, it will not be because of economic sanctions.

I feel that we might be deluding ourselves if we believe that there is great efficacy in this. If I thought for one moment that this measure would hasten by one hour the release of the American hostages, I would welcome with jubilation this particular piece of legislation. I do not think it will have any effect whatsoever. Quite often the effect is the opposite. Many times a regime has been entrenched by hostility from without.

What is perhaps more likely to happen in Iran is that it may collapse from within, because if there ever was a government in the world that demonstrated chaos, inefficiency, iniquity and disdain for any sort of decent standard of international conduct, it is that outrageous government. To the extent that this measure gives Canada an emotional posture against the actions of the government, I find in that—not in its efficacy—justification for the legislation. Therefore, I will support it.

Down through the years in this chamber, and in the one which existed before the fire of 1916, senators have stood up on days like this and railed against the fact that important measures come here at the last minute. I cannot pass comment on the other place, but I note that this measure did not go to a committee there, and it appears that it will not go to a committee here. I think measures of this importance should be studied and should be reflected upon. I don't know why this could not have come before this house earlier so that it might be studied in our committee. I say that, because if a measure is important enough to be rushed through, it is sufficiently important for careful study.

[Senator Asselin.]

I should point out that I am not the first one, by any means, to bring this up. Greater men and women down through the years have proclaimed the ill-treatment of the Senate. Arthur Meighen described it as a travesty. He was one of the greatest parliamentarians we ever had, and I think there will be no dispute that he was the greatest debater we had in public life. He said it was a travesty that in the closing of a session we are given a plethora of legislation and are expected to adopt it without amendment, without debate, and without delay.

An individual member can do something about delaying a piece of legislation if he wishes to assert his individuality, but today I am a poor choice for that. I love Ottawa, but I detest its summer climate. I am lucky enough to live in a place which has a beautiful summer climate, Prince Edward Island, and I do have my reservations for tomorrow.

Apart from that, I should like to mention this, and I will probably bring it up again. I do not like this sort of thing. It is not the fault of the other house, as Senator Flynn pointed out. He said his problem was not with the other house, but with the government, because the government is the master of the agenda of the other place. I feel a little ill at ease that this important measure concerning an international situation should come before us and we are simply expected to say it is a nice thing and deal with it in a few minutes. I am not altogether happy with that process, but having great respect for my colleagues in this party, including Senator Asselin, I will put my misgivings to one side and say that I am fully in accord with the ultimate decision which is to support the measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN MOTHER

FELICITATIONS ON EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Perrault, seconded by Senator Roblin, pursuant to notice of Monday, July 14, 1980, moved:

> That the Honourable the Speaker convey to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, the congratulations of the Senate of Canada on Her completion on August 4, 1980 of Her eightieth year, expressing the gratitude of the people of Canada for the many services Her Majesty has rendered them over the years, including

Her many visits, beginning with the first in 1939 when she accompanied Her husband, His Majesty King George VI, on the first visit of a reigning monarch to this country, and wishing Her continued good health and long life.

He said: Honourable senators will realize that this motion was to be proposed by Senator Perrault. Perhaps in his name I could make the following brief remarks. The Queen Mother's life has been an inspiration to all Canadians. I recall in the year 1939 I was standing on the corner of Yonge and King Street with my father and mother and waving at the royal car as it passed. The inspiration of the Royal Family to Canadians has been so important, and has been so ideally symbolized by the grace, dignity, charm and culture of the Queen Mother, that I know that every honourable senator and every Canadian will wholeheartedly support the motion proposed today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am honoured to be associated with this motion of congratulation to Her Majesty the Queen Mother, as my memory is similar to that of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. In 1939 His Majesty King George VI and Queen Elizabeth came on a visit to this country, and I well remember that it was a rather rainy day in Winnipeg when the royal entourage came down Main Street in an open vehicle, accompanied by a squadron of Mounted Police with pennants flying. I recall the sincere enthusiasm of the extremely large number of people who welcomed Their Majesties in all parts of Manitoba, as they did throughout the nation. I believe it taught us a lesson on what the monarchy can mean for the national spirit of the country.

I am aware that the role of the Monarch's Consort is perhaps symbolic in most respects, but I am sure that she took some considerable part in those functions which her husband discharged, when he exercised his right to be informed by the government over which he presided and to warn and advise. On that occasion in 1939, something of the Queen Mother's character, her elegant simplicity, if I may use that description, came across to all who had the opportunity to see her and to come in contact with her.

She epitomized then, as she has done all her life, those highest qualities that we would like to see in human beings and in the nation. It is a happy circumstance that over the years, since the death of His Majesty King George VI, the Queen Mother has maintained a close and cordial association with her people in Canada. In the numerous visits she has made here she has established and reinforced the warm place that she occupies in the hearts of the people of this country. Therefore I am happy, in the name of all my colleagues on this side of the house, to associate myself very sincerely and warmly with the good wishes expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I was not in the house when tribute was paid to Her Majesty the Queen Mother, nor did I have the benefit of hearing the full scope of Senator Roblin's remarks. But since we are expressing our congratulations and compliments to the Queen Mother, I would like to add that among the visits to which Senator Roblin referred which the Queen Mother made, the most recent was the visit she made to Nova Scotia last summer when she returned to officiate at the tattoo that was held to celebrate the Gathering of the Clans.

It was a magnificent and impressive occasion, and its magnificence and impressiveness were added to by the presence of the Queen Mother. When she made her entrance, she was driven into the auditorium, she got out of the automobile at the foot of the steps, she took her place, moved up to the centre of the platform and stood in the spotlight. She was wearing a jewelled tiara, and it sparkled; but I can assure honourable senators that it did not sparkle any more than the warmth, friendliness and radiance of the smile with which she greeted that audience. During the course of that performance—and it went on for several hours—whenever attention was drawn to the fact that Her Majesty the Queen Mother was in attendance, there was an almost—I was going to say visible, but certainly a very perceptible feeling of warmth and good will that flowed between the regal presence on the platform and the crowd in the auditorium.

I wish to associate myself with everything that has been said, and to endorse all those fine things that have been said about the very wonderful person and character to whom we are offering congratulations on her birthday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would not attempt to paint the lily, because we have heard three moving, brief, extremely appropriate speeches. I think the honourable gentlemen have encapsulated the qualities of this great woman. Perhaps I might be allowed a little partiality, as one in this chamber who is of Highland Scots descent, and say that whatever we have done for or against the monarchy—and my ancestors have done both—in this great lady we have made a contribution which has brought a gleam in the eyes of honourable senators here in Ottawa, has brought joy to the people of the Commonwealth, has brought all the qualities that my colleagues have mentioned; and I would like to mention one other quality which we do not talk about so much these days. In simple terms, it is goodness. As well as being a gracious, intelligent, warm woman, she is clearly a fine woman, and we can all be thankful for her life, and wish her well.

FORT NELSON INDIAN RESERVE MINERALS REVENUE SHARING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-26, to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have just a word to say on this matter. I would like to point out that we had an interesting meeting in committee. Everything went well. I don't know if that was because the sponsor of the bill was not there.

Senator Frith: I would be happy to accommodate on another occasion.

Senator Flynn: In any event, we listened to the grievances of the representatives of the Indian Brotherhood. I think that Senator Neiman, who was there, would by and large agree that their grievances are addressed to legislation affecting them in general, rather than to this bill in particular.

However that may be, what we have done is to ask the chairman of the committee to send to the Minister of Indian Affairs a copy of the printed proceedings, with the suggestion that he consider the grievances that were aired at the meeting. But as far as the bill itself is concerned, it seemed to us that there was nothing else to do but report it without amendment and agree that it be read immediately for the third time.

Senator Frith: On behalf of the government I thank the committee for its good work, and compliment it on the suggestion that its proceedings be sent to the minister for his consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn until the call of the bell, at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Will there be anything for the Senate to deal with between 8 o'clock and the time of royal assent?

Senator Frith: Yes, this was agreed to during the absence of the Leader of the Opposition at a committee meeting. The plan is to receive the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill C-18. There may then be a statement made both here and in the other place, which we will deal with. That should take us to royal assent.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

[Senator Donahoe.]

PRIVATE BILL

PYRAMID COMMUNICATIONS LIMITED—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-8, to revive Pyramid Communications Limited, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed this bill without amendment.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees.

Hon. Daniel Riley, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, to which was referred Bill C-18, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 17, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred Bill C-18, intituled: "An Act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, July 17, 1980, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

In view of the importance of this bill from the point of view of public safety and the obvious requirement for continuing study of its provisions because of the changing nature of the standards and procedures involved in the handling of dangerous goods, your Committee recommends that, when the Senate resumes its sittings in the fall, the Senate authorize it to undertake an examination of the subject-matter of this bill and the regulations to be made thereunder and to report thereon.

Your Committee wishes to report that it has been assured that, if such a review of the legislation takes place, your Committee will have the full cooperation of the Minister of Transport and the officials of his department.

Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL RILEY,
Acting Chairman.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

July 17, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert George Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of July, at 9.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wonder if I have the leave of the Senate to make a statement.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, with your permission I should like to make a statement today with respect to the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline project. More specifically I wish to bring to the attention of honourable senators the decision which has been taken by the government to approve in principle construction of the southern segments of this pipeline system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators will recall that in 1977, Canada and the United States signed a bilateral agreement to build the pipeline.

In 1978 Parliament passed legislation to implement that agreement, and there have been two major changes in circumstances since then. First, the original time for the scheduled completion of the line has been set back from January 1983 to late 1985. The second major change relates to the proposed prebuilding of the southern segments of the system. Its initial purpose of exporting Alberta gas to western and midwestern U.S. markets has taken on considerably greater importance.

Prebuilding has become of prime importance in two ways. First, as a means of facilitating completion of the entire project, and, second, in terms of the substantial and widespread economic benefit it promises to provide to Canada.

In its original conception, the southern portion of the line was to be built only moderately in advance of the remainder of the system in the north. The effect of the delays I mentioned has been that the prebuilding could now take place well in advance of the construction of the rest of the system.

There has been, of course, another development. In the intervening years the volume of Canadian gas supplies surplus to our needs and available for export has grown from some 800 billion cubic feet to about 4.5 trillion cubic feet.

A number of steps have been taken by the government to take into account this changing situation. First, the National Energy Board made the following determination: If prebuilding were to be undertaken on schedule, with commencement of construction of the western leg this summer, then it would be necessary to modify condition 12 of the Northern Pipeline Act.

Because of the delays which I have mentioned, it would have been quite impossible for Foothills (Yukon) in these very difficult circumstances to meet the original requirement of establishing that financing had been obtained for the whole line in Canada.

• (2010)

Second, on April 2 the National Energy Board issued an order amending condition 12, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. The amendment required Foothills to satisfy both the Board and me, as minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, on two major points. First, we had to be satisfied by Foothills that the financing has been obtained for prebuilding of the southern sections of the system in Canada; second, we had to be satisfied that financing could be obtained for the remainder of the system before construction of the prebuild would be authorized; third, on April 2 also, I requested the National Energy Board to hold public hearings in order to obtain evidence as to whether Foothills could meet the terms of condition 12 as revised with respect to financing.

At the same time, however, I advised the Board that the government intended to defer consideration of its order on this condition until it could also consider two other closely related matters. One was the pending recommendation of the National Energy Board with respect to applications from Pan-Alberta. The latter had requested a licence to export an additional 500 billion cubic feet of gas remaining in the unallocated surplus previously identified by the Board as a means of establishing the financial viability of the prebuild. The other matter requiring consideration was the position of the United States government, its view as to the financeability of the pipeline system within its territory, and the outlook for its timely completion.

Let me deal with the last issue first. The government has had before it information on a number of steps that have been taken in the United States to encourage and facilitate the commencement and expeditious completion of the project by late 1985. These steps include recent decisions by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission certifying the prebuilding of the western and eastern legs of the system to the lower 48 states for the initial purpose of transporting surplus Alberta gas pending the throughput of Alaska reserves. They include also the June 19 agreement between the major gas producers in Alaska, Exxon, B.P., Sohio and Arco—and Northwest Alaskan, the pipeline sponsor in that area—on the sharing of some $500 million in expenditures to complete final design and engineering work required to construct the pipeline and conditioning plants in Alaska and to arrive at final cost estimates.

On June 19 the producers and sponsor also signed a statement of intention in which they undertook to work together to facilitate the financing of the pipeline and the conditioning plant in Alaska with a view to achieving completion of the system by the end of 1985.

As you are all aware, the strong and continuing commitment of the U.S. Congress was forcefully expressed through a joint resolution unanimously approved within the past few days by both houses. This resolution emphasized the conviction of Congress that the Alaska Highway gas pipeline remains "an essential part of securing this nation's energy future and, as such, enjoys the highest level of Congressional support for its expeditious construction and completion by the end of 1985."

Finally, the Canadian government took account of the assurances that President Carter has indicated the U.S. government was prepared to make with respect to the financeability and timely completion of the system within its territory given the developments to which I have just referred.

Based on all these factors, and on the formal assurances that President Carter is ready to provide in a letter to Prime Minister Trudeau, the Canadian government is prepared to accept the U.S. government's judgment that the project within its territory can be financed and will be completed expeditiously.

● (2015)

With the permission of honourable senators I would like to table copies of the joint resolution of Congress, and the statement of intention by the producers and the pipeline sponsor in Alaska. I will be happy also to table a copy of the President's letter. I will have that material when I reach the end of my comments here.

To repeat, the Canadian government has accepted United States assurances on timely completion of the whole project. It is also prepared to authorize additional exports, recommended by the National Energy Board, through the prebuild system in order to establish the financial viability of that stage of the project. It also approved the amendment of condition 12, schedule III, made by the board.

I referred earlier to the hearings undertaken by the National Energy Board at my request on the ability of Foothills to meet the revised condition 12. In a statement following these hearings, the National Energy Board raised four matters of concern with respect to the financeability of the project in Canada. All of these matters related to issues involving decisions in the United States. Foothills itself initially raised all these issues as potential problem areas. However, in response to an inquiry on this matter by the National Energy Board, Foothills indicated that because of more recent developments it was confident that these issues had been, or would be, satisfactorily resolved. It still remains necessary, however, for the board and me, as the minister responsible, to make a judgment as to whether Foothills is in fact capable of meeting the requirements of condition 12 as amended. With respect to the financing of the project in Canada, I expect that both the board and I will be in a position to reach a decision on that question within the next few days and an announcement will be made to that effect.

Assuming this last issue of policy is satisfactorily resolved, the way will finally be cleared for a start on construction of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline. The southern segment will commence within the next few weeks, and probably less than weeks.

It has been suggested in some quarters that prebuilding would amount to the construction only of an export line and represent a very different project from that provided for in the Northern Pipeline Act. Such an allegation is completely groundless. What is proposed is the construction in two stages of a fully integrated system capable of carrying Alaska gas to the lower 48 states and providing access to Canada's own gas in the Mackenzie delta.

I spoke earlier of assurances by the United States government. We are satisfied that the United States is committed to building their portion of the line by the end of 1985. We base this on a recognition of the absolutely vital national interest of the United States in gaining access to its gas at Prudhoe Bay, which represents more than 10 per cent of all its established reserves and its largest single new source of energy for the foreseeable future.

To be sure, there are risks. However, against these risks must be weighed the substantial benefits of prebuilding.

First, as I stated earlier, construction of the southern segments for the initial transportation of Alberta gas would spur completion of the entire project. It would provide an early cash flow to pipeline sponsors that would be a big help to them in financing the remainder of the pipeline.

Secondly, by stretching out the construction timetable, it would also ease the strain on skilled manpower and the supply of goods and services and ensure a very high level of Canadian input into the project. In other words, prebuild fits in with the current economic cycle in this country.

● (2025)

Finally, prebuilding of the western and eastern legs and the initial export of surplus Canadian gas will provide substantial economic benefit to this country. According to some estimates, this will result in direct capital expenditures in Canada of a total of $1.6 billion, the benefits of which will be felt right across the country in terms of jobs and output. Of this amount, some $665 million would be spent on the prebuild facilities themselves and another $935 million on installation of the production wells, conditioning plants, and the gathering and other facilities required to deliver the gas to the Foothills pipeline.

The prebuild project and associated developments would create employment directly and indirectly over the period between 1980 and 1984 of 150,000 man-years.

The National Energy Board itself has concluded that prebuilding alone and the flow of Canadian gas to the United States can generate national economic benefits of some $4.5 billion. A substantial portion of those benefits will come through the potential sale over the life of approved export contracts of around $17 billion worth of gas and natural gas liquid by-products, which, in turn, will provide a positive boost to Canada's balance of payments position of some $2 billion a year.

The export of natural gas through the prebuild will provide a substantial benefit to hundreds of small and medium-sized Canadian-owned producers, many of whom at present have substantial shut-in reserves because of the absence of markets either in Canada or in the United States. The opening up of markets for these supplies that are surplus to Canadian needs will provide the cash flow such producers require in order to maintain exploration at the high level required to develop additional gas reserves with which to meet our own requirements over the long haul. For some of these Canadian companies at least, a failure to secure early access to U.S. markets could leave them with little other choice but to sell out their interests to large, multinational oil companies that can afford to hold gas in the ground for a long time. Such an alternative would clearly be contrary to our policy of greatly increasing domestic ownership and control of the petroleum industry in this country.

Prebuild, though, is just part of the story. The total project—both northern and southern portions—according to best estimates will, in and of itself, result in a one per cent gain in Canada's GNP, with benefits including $2 billion in pipe orders to Canadian mills; 350,000 direct and indirect man-years of employment; and the development of Canadian expertise and export capability.

Given the nature of the U.S. assurances, the government has decided there is minimal risk of non-completion or long delay in the construction of the entire Alaska Highway gas pipeline system. On the other hand are the very substantial benefits that prebuilding will provide—facilitating completion of the entire project and immediate returns to Canada in terms of jobs, output, producer revenues and balance of payments inflows. I do not believe there can be any doubt that our national interest lies in proceeding with this important undertaking at the earliest possible date.

Honourable senators, I should like to table several documents, including a copy of a letter from the President of the United States to the Prime Minister of Canada, and a joint statement of intention by the major participants involved, the producers and the sponsors in Alaska.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson then tabled:

Copies of document entitled: "Concurrent Resolution Expressing the Sense of Congress Regarding the Importance of the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System". (English text)

Copies of letter from the President of the United States of America to the Prime Minister of Canada regarding the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System assurances, dated July 17, 1980. (English text)

Copies of Statement of Intention by the producers and pipeline sponsor in Alaska. (English text)

● (2030)

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, we on this side of the chamber welcome the decision of the Government of Canada to proceed with the prebuild phase of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline project at this time.

I have, on previous occasions, expressed concern with respect to the firmness of the commitment of the United States to complete the project. However, in the circumstances, as the Minister of State for Economic Development himself has said, and as the Prime Minister has said, it finally boils down to a judgment call with respect to the adequacy of the assurances that have been given and, I suppose, that is what being the government is all about.

If, in the event, the second phase of the project does not materialize, the error in the government's judgment will be obvious and a political price will no doubt be paid.

As the minister has said, construction of the prebuild section of the pipeline will make possible export sales of Canadian natural gas to the United States, thus creating cash flow for independent Canadian resource companies which are at the moment in dire straits with an over-supply of shut-in gas in inventory and which will earn badly needed foreign exchange for the Government of Canada and significantly contribute to the financial viability of the entire project.

My party has been consistent in this view, both in opposition and in government. Indeed, it was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in Prime Minister Clark's government who approved the recommendation of the National Energy Board on December 6 last with respect to the exportable surplus gas which will be carried to the United States market by means of this pipeline facility.

I think, however, that all honourable senators will understand if I take this occasion to draw to the attention of the Senate, and to the people of Canada, the incredible flip-flop that this decision constitutes so far as the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned. Let me quote from remarks made by the honourable gentleman in the other place on December 6 last when the recommendation of the National Energy Board with respect to gas exports was approved by the government of the day. That honourable gentleman had this to say:

> I think this statement will be one that Canada will live to regret and that may go down in history as one of the greatest sellouts we have seen.

He went on to say:

> The worst thing we could do is to export gas for a fast buck or in order to support a faltering dollar, because then it will mean that down the line we will have to supply our Canadian needs with more expensive and more polluting resources, such as coal for instance.

He continued:

> In our view, exports of natural gas to the United States should be authorized only on the basis of, first of all, an ironclad commitment regarding the building of the whole Alaska gas pipeline. Everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered, particularly the financing plan and the financing guarantees, before we start exporting one cubic foot of gas out of this country to the United States.

Senator Roblin: That is what he said.

Senator Balfour: He went on to say:

> Second, there must be an arrangement for swaps in this agreement with the United States so that down the line, if Canada were to need natural gas, we would be in a position to obtain natural gas from the Alaska gas pipeline—

Finally, he said:

> The third point is with regard to revenues and arises out of gas exports to the United States. They should be used to ensure the initiation and completion of the Quebec and Maritime Gas Pipeline.

I think I could legitimately put to the Minister of State for Economic Development some questions with respect to his colleague's position seven short months ago. For example, is it still the position of his party that extension of the Q & M Pipeline to the maritimes should take priority over the prebuild? Is it still his party's position that revenue from gas exports to the United States should be used to construct the full Q & M Pipeline, and are these government or private sector revenues that are referred to?

What about the swap arrangement whereby he insisted that the United States should agree to replace in the future exported Canadian natural gas with Prudhoe Bay gas? What about the sell-out accusation?

I put these questions rhetorically, honourable senators, because I am realistic enough to know that satisfactory answers will not be forthcoming since no reasonable explanation can be offered for the minister's ironclad flip-flop, except that whatever embarrassment he may now experience—and I can see that he is difficult to embarrass—is the political price he should pay for outspoken, intemperate, and what I can only characterize as irresponsible criticism, on the occasion of the December 6 announcement made by his predecessor.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, if I may, I too welcome the announcement—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not in accordance with the rules. If you want to launch a debate, that is something else. I think you have enough with the statement made by Senator Olson.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Robert George Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

An Act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

An Act respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes.

An Act to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve.

An Act to provide for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran.

An Act to revive Pyramid Communications Limited.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 15, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on behalf of the government, I wish all honourable senators a very happy, pleasant and nourishing summer in every way. We look forward to seeing you all back in the fall. We thank you particularly for your co-operation during the past few days, and in this respect I single out my honourable and learned friend, Senator Flynn, and my honourable and knowledgeable friend, Senator Roblin.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I did not ask the other side for instructions at this time, but I am quite sure that honourable senators on this side of the house would want me to wish all those on the government side a happy and restful recess. I particularly hope that Senator Olson, after what he has had to go through today, and what he may have to go through during the rest of the summer, will have quieter days than the ones he has had to endure lately.

Of course, we have always been very pleasant to him. On the other hand, he has never been very vindictive. He has never ventured any declaration of any substance. He has always been careful in whatever he had to say. I have yet to find out what he meant by most of his replies to questions.

In any event, I must say that we on this side of the house need the forthcoming period of rest. It is not that we do not like the members on the government side individually, but we need to forget them for a while.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I know that it is not usual for comments to be made other than by the two leaders at this point in time—

Senator Frith: Be careful; don't tell them anything.

Senator Olson: —but I want to respond to the kind and generous comments of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. I can say to him that I have learned a great deal from him during the time I have been a member of this chamber. First, when he was the Leader of the Opposition, we were well instructed by the example that he gave us; and when he was on the government benches he was a shining example of the way to answer questions. One of the things that I learned from him above all is that you only give as much information as is sought.

During the summer he might like to look at the section dealing with the terms and conditions under which questions are put in the fifth edition of Beauchesne. Perhaps he would like to spend part of the summer looking at that section so that we may have, even for his own benefit, a Question Period that does fit the rules. I hope he will not suggest, because I got away with certain things when I was on the opposition side, that that justifies members of the opposition getting away with it now; because I fully acknowledge that there was an odd time when I stretched the rules almost to the limit, but I never quite went over the threshold.

In any event, I want to express my appreciation to him and to the other members of the opposition for many things, but particularly for making my life on this side of the house interesting.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, October 15, at 8 p.m.

INTERIM REPORT ON THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING TRADE AND COMMERCE

Relating to the subject matter of Bill C-6 of the First Session, 32nd Parliament, 1980 (and also the predecessor Bill C-14 of the First Session, 31st Parliament and Bills C-15 and C-57 of the Fourth and Third Sessions, Thirtieth Parliament) an Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

JULY 17, 1980

General Introduction

On May 1st, 1980, the Honourable Pierre Bussieres on behalf of the Honourable John MacEachen, The Minister of Finance, presented to the House of Commons for first reading Bill C-6, "An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Bank Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof." This Act is cited as the "Bank and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980". On April 29, 1980 the Standing Senate Committe on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized by the Senate to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-6 in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your Committee gave careful consideration to Bill C-6 and in connection therewith had the benefit of the services and expert assistance of Mr. John F. Lewis, C.A., financial consultant, retired partner of Thorne, Riddell, Chartered Accountants as advisor to the Committee and retained its legal Counsel, Mr. David W. Scott. Q.C. of Scott & Aylen.

In order to provide some background to your Committee's studies of the proposed legislation, it might be simplest to repeat the following resumé from our report on Bill C-14. It will be remembered that the history of this decennial revision of Banking legislation included a White Paper on the Revision of Canadian Banking Legislation which was issued in August, 1976. Your Committee examined that document, heard witnesses, and submitted its report to the Senate in June, 1977. Many of the recommendations of your Committee on that document were implemented in the banking legislation of Bill C-15 of the Fourth Session of Parliament which was introduced by the Honourable Jean Chretien, Minister of Finance on November 2, 1978.

Your Committee, assisted by the same advisors, John F. Lewis and David W. Scott, studied Bill C-15, heard witnesses and reported to the Senate on March 7, 1979.

In the course of its study on Bill C-15 your Committee held seventeen meetings during which witnesses were heard, and also received and studied a number of briefs from organizations which did not appear before the Committee. Bill C-15 reflected twenty-four amendments proposed by your Committee as a result of its study and recommendations on the White Paper, of which five represented instances where your Committee's opinion did not agree with the White Paper proposals. In approximately five additional instances your Committee's recommendations made in its report on the White Paper were accepted in part.

As part of its study of Bill C-14 your Committee held ten meetings, of which five were devoted to study of the Bill and review of this report. Mr. W. A Kennett, Inspector General of Banks, together with members of his staff, appeared as witnesses before the Committee at three of the sessions.

In its report on March 8, 1979, on the subject matter of Bill C-15, your committee made forty-two recommendations for amendments to the banking legislation as proposed in that Bill. Of these, aproximately twenty-five of your Committee's recommendations have been accepted in full in Bill C-14, approximately ten have been accepted in part, and seven have not been accepted.

In addition, the recommendations with respect to the proposed legislation included approximately ten recommendations for changes in the draft proposed regulations which were issued by the Minister of Finance in conjunction with Bill C-15. Because all of these regulations in their amended form have not been reissued at this date, your Committee does not consider it advisable to comment in detail at this time on the few amended redrafts of the regulations which have been issued so far.

During the course of its study of Bill C-6 your Committee held meetings which were devoted to hearing the following witnesses:

Canadian Bankers' Association
Federation of Automobile Dealers Associations of Canada
Association of Canadian Financial Corporations
Canadian Cattlemen's Association
Housing & Urban Development Association of Canada
Canadian Council of Churches
Canadian Automotive Leasing Association
Trust Companies Association of Canada

Summary of Legislation

Because the process of this decennial revision of the Bank Act has been spread over a period of approximately four years including the publication of a White Paper and separate bills to four sessions of Parliament, it might be of some assistance to summarize for the reader the content of the legislation culminating in Bill C-6.

Bill C-6 contains not only an amended Bank Act and the new Canadian Payments Association Act, but also important amendments to other related Acts, as follows:

PART I The Bank Act, (pages 1 to 344 of Bill C-6)
PART II Amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act (pages 345 to 414 of Bill C-6)
PART III Amendments to the Bank of Canada Acts (pages 415 to 421 of Bill C-6)
PART IV An Act to establish the Canadian Payments Association (pages 422 to 439 of Bill C-6)
PART V Related and Consequential Amendments to other legislation (pages 440 to 457 of Bill C-6)

It should also be noted that Part I of Bill C-6, being the new Bank Act contains approximately four hundred provisions which are based on equivalent provisions of the Canadian Business Corporations Act.

The main changes contemplated in this decennial review of the banking system might be summarized as follows:

1. Changes and reduction in primary cash reserves required to be provided by Canadian banks;
2. Entry to new banks into the banking system in Canada either by Special Act of Parliament or by Letters Patent;
3. Entry and control of and conditions for the operation in Canada of foreign bank subsidiaries incorporated under the new Bank Act;
4. Further delineation of specific business power of banks;
5. Changes in the corporate structure of banks;
6. Provisions requiring or permitting banks to conduct certain types of undertakings, i.e. leasing, factoring, mortgage lending—through subsidiaries;
7. Establishment by a Special Act of Parliament of the Canadian Payments Association which would include banks and near-banks in the evolving national electronic payments system for clearing and settlement purposes;
8. Amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act, the Bank of Canada Act and other related legislation.

In its reports on Bill C-14 and C-15, your Committee summarized in the manner in which these bills, in their various aspects, implemented the White Paper proposals and the extent to which the recommendations of your Committee had been dealt with. This report will not repeat those observations nor deal with many of the new amendments proposed in Bill C-6 which reflect your Committee's recommendations in a general or reasonable manner, nor comment on the many technical and editing changes arising from the recommendations of this Committee and other interested parties.

On June 20th, 1980 the Minister provided the Chairman of the Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with the text of 10 proposed amendments to Bill C-6. For reasons which are not apparent your Committee was not provided with this material nonetheless copies of the prepared amendments have been secured and, in the interest of practicality, have been reviewed, and, in some cases, commented upon in this Report.

Recommendations of the Committee

The Committee's main recommendations with respect to Bill C-6 concern the following subjects:

1. Financial leasing through Subsidiaries.
2. Exemption of cattle from "Section 88" Security.
3. Limit on Mortgage Lending by Banks.

4. Form of Public Review of Application for incorporation.
5. Ownership of Bank shares by Provincial Governments.

2. Financial Leasing of Equipment through Subsidiaries

In the White Paper of August 1976 on Canadian Banking Legislation (Page 30), having reviewed the history of financial leasing, its benefits from the point of view of its function as an alternative to credit, and the tax implications thereof, the government White Paper observed as follows:

> "Without the possibility of tax sheltering of non-leasing income, leasing will become a closer substitute for term lending and borrowing in the capital market. It becomes therefore a natural activity for banks as they can contribute to the development of this form of lending for the benefit of industry as a whole and in particular for small and medium size businesses. It is now proposed to allow the banks to engage in financial leasing of equipment subject to regulations prescribed by the Governor in Council."

At the time of publication of the White Paper some chartered banks were already, through subsidiaries as authorized by Section 76 of the current Bank Act, in the leasing business. This activity has continued to the present and Bill C-6 carries forward the intention to permit banks to engage in financial leasing of equipment as appears from Clause 173(1)(j) which reads as follows:

> (1) "A bank may engage in and carry on such business generally as appertains to the business of banking and without limiting the generality of the foregoing may, . . .
> (j) through a subsidiary of the bank and not otherwise, subject to any terms and conditions prescribed by the regulations, engage in financial leasing, and in the course thereof acquire, at the request of a specific lessee for leasing by him, hold and and lease personal property whether or not such property becomes affixed to real property;"

In addition, and in order to ensure that leases are, so far as is possible the functional equivalent of credit, which was the rationale underlying the proposal in the White Paper, the regulations have provided that the lease must be tied to specific equipment and it must be on a non-operating and full pay-out basis.

Your Committee has had occasion, since the issue of the White Paper and through the successive Bills, to study in detail the issue of financial leasing and the suitability of this business power for the activities of chartered banks. Specifically in your Committee's report of the 28th of June 1977 in response to the White Paper under Article VI, the subject of financial leasing was reviewed. The report developed its rationale for approving the concept of banks engaging in financial leasing in the following language:

> "While competition from banks undoubtedly would affect companies in the field at present, commercial realities dictate that financial leasing has become, to a great extent, financial equivalent of credit or term lending and an accepted banking responsibility or service and that banks should be permitted to engage in financial leasing."

Your Committee recommended in response to the White Paper that banks be permitted to enter this field, but recommended that the residual value of leased equipment be limited to 10% as opposed to the 20% proposed in the White Paper. The reasoning here was to ensure that the banks did not become involved in extensive marketing of used equipment at the conclusion of the lease. In addition your Committee recommended that leasing operations be permitted to be conducted through separate wholly owned subsidiaries.

Bill C-15 (Bill C-57 of the previous Session) carried forward the White Paper recommendation and proposed that banks be permitted to engage in financial leasing. At the time of consideration of Bill C-15 the principal issues before your Committee were whether or not the banks ought to be permitted to engage in financial leasing of passenger automobiles and on-road truck vehicles on an individual unit basis or on a fleet basis, and also whether or not the banks ought to be permitted to operate their financial leasing affairs through subsidiary companies.

Again carrying forward the conclusions reached in response to the White Paper, your Committee recommended that banks be permitted to conduct their leasing business through subsidiaries in order to avoid conflicts of interest with other departments of the bank.

Your Committee considered the successor to Bill C-15 being Bill C-14, in its report dated December 5th, 1979. Bill C-14 for the first time introduced the concept by which it would be mandatory for banks to conduct their leasing activities through subsidiaries which was in line with the reasoning developed by your Committee heretofore Bill C-14 carried forward the other aspects of Bill C-15 and in particular the requirement for 20% residual value.

The present Bill, carried forward in virtually identical terms in both the Bill itself and the regulations, the concepts contained in the Bill C-14. On the other hand, unlike the situation at the time that Bill C-14 was reviewed by your Committee, the Automobile Dealers, the leasing companies, and the banks themselves have become involved in a very rigorous way in appearances before your Committee, designed in the case of the Automobile Dealers and leasing Companies to effect radical changes to the financial leasing provisions of Bill C-6, and in the case of the banks to preserve the Bill in the form in which it appears. Your Committee has heard from the Federation of Automobile Dealers Association, Canadian Automobile Leasing Associations, and from the Canadian Bankers Association, and their respective views on the subject matter of the Legislation have been canvassed in great detail.

The Canadian Bankers Association, speaking for the banking community, defend the provisions of the present Bill and the entry of banks into financial leasing of automotive vehicles on the basis of the desirability, in the public interest, of fostering competitions with a view to reducing the cost of leased automobiles. The CBA made, inter alia, the following points:

1. Financial leasing is the functional equivalent of credit and therefore it makes good sense that the banks be permitted to engage in this business activity;
2. The presence of the banking community in the financial leasing business will bring the cost of leasing down as was the case when the banks were permitted into the sales finance business;
3. The banks do not intend to enter the automotive merchandising business. Disposal of leased vehicles in the event of default would be no different from that under conditional sales contracts, and arrangements could be made with respect to the disposition of vehicles at the end of the lease which would involve the lessee, and not the bank, in disposing of the vehicle.
4. The banks do not intend to become involved in one-on-one leasing and the limitation on residual value of 20% will, in effect, ensure this result.

As pointed out, extensive submissions against the provisions of Bill C-6 were made by the automobile dealers and the leasing companies. Their submissions overlapped somewhat as, while it is clear that the financial leasing companies are not ordinarily engaged in one-on-one leasing, by the same token the automobile dealers are engaged to a certain extent in fleet leasing, and thus their submissions can be considered together. Their general complaints were:

(a) that it is a form of conflict of interest for a bank to engage in financial leasing by reason of the fact that the dealers and leasing companies would resort to banks for working capital and operating loans and thus the banks are in possession of the customer lists and other leasing information of these companies and are in a position to compete unfairly;

(b) by reason of the banks ability to attract low cost deposits, they are in a position to quote "unrealistic leasing rates" and eliminate the leasing companies and dealers from the field;

(c) contrary to what is said by the banks, the presence in the field of foreign owned leasing companies is minimal, at best 11% of the companies, at worst 33% of the companies;

(d) the banks will necessarily have to become involved as merchandisers of automobiles because the public will not accept a leasing arrangement under which the lessee is responsible to dispose of the automobile at the end of the term;

(e) the activity of banks in the United States in the leasing business has, in the view of the dealers and leasing companies, been disruptive and there is said to be a growing movement to prohibit banks from engaging in automobile leasing;

(f) conflict of interest as above described is heightened by the desire of potential lessees to conduct their leasing businesses with their bank upon whom they depend for ordinary lines of credit;

(g) the dealers and leasing companies have no objection to what is incorrectly called "true financial leasing" that is to say where the dealers and leasing companies negotiate the lease and finance the acquisition of the vehicles through a bank, the bank taking the lease as collateral security.

In addition to a general discussion of the pros and cons of the banks being permitted into the leasing field, it became apparent that the leasing companies and the automobile dealers are really seeking to prevent the banks from engaging in the leasing of automobiles and light and medium trucks, whether on an individual one-to-one basis or on a fleet basis. The dealers and leasing companies, in short, desire to prevent the banks from engaging in the leasing business where the subject matter of the lease is a vehicle which would be ordinarily sold from an automobile dealership. The banks while conceding the inappropriateness of their being involved in one-to-one passenger automobile leasing, and while showing a willingness to have some limitation at the lower end of the scale in the amount of on road motor vehicles covered by a fleet lease, otherwise desire to engage fully in the automobile leasing business as contemplated by the provisions of the bill.

In addition to their appearances before your Committee, the automobile dealers and the banks have disclosed to your Committee that they have met on several occasions with a view to negotiating a compromise position in terms of desirable legislation. While these laudable efforts have been unsuccessful, they have served to crystallize with far greater clarity than the submissions themselves, the precise areas of difference as between these competing groups. An analysis of the leasing business is best effected by dividing the basic types of leasing into three, namely individual leases, fleet leases, and indirect forms of leasing.

(i) Individual Vehicle Leasing

This type of lease contemplates not merely an automobile of the passenger variety, but also trucks. In short any on road vehicle that would ordinarily be sold from a conventional automobile dealership. The position of the banks is that they are willing to be prohibited from engaging in individual leasing of passenger cars entirely. Further, they are willing to limit their involvement in the individual leasing of trucks by providing that they will not become involved in the individual leasing of an on road commercial vehicle unless the vehicle exceeds 16,000 pounds G.V.W. This in effect should prohibit the banks from engaging in the individual leasing of light trucks.

The dealers are ad idem with the bankers in concluding that the banks ought not to be involved in the direct leasing of passenger cars. On the other hand, by reason of the fact that the 16,000 pounds G.V.W. limitation proposed by the banks for commercial vehicles would permit the banks to engage in individual leasing of certain trucks which would ordinarily be available from an automobile dealership, the dealers would prohibit the banks from engaging in individual leasing where the vehicle is less than 46,000 pounds G.V.W. The evidence establishes that 46,000 G.V.W. is a convenient and firmly established method of describing, in terms of on-road vehicles, trucks with two driven axles, i.e. the tractor trailer variety that is seen carrying heavy loads on the highway. In addition of course, this limitation would not affect the right of the banks to lease industrial equipment for off road use including aircraft etc. and on road vehicles weighing more than 46,000 pounds G.V.W.

(ii) Fleet Leasing

In the area of fleet leasing the banks would be prepared to be prohibited from engaging in fleet leasing where the value of the motor vehicles leased is less than $100,000 in the case of a single transaction for a specified period of time. In very round numbers if one were dealing with passenger automobiles this would in effect mean that the banks would only be entitled to engage in fleet leasing where there were at least 10 vehicles involved in the lease.

The dealers on the other hand propose that the banks be prohibited from engaging in fleet leasing unless the fleet consists of a minimum of 100 vehicles. In the banks terms this proposed constraint would limit the banks to engaging in fleet leasing where the value of the equipment leased was in the neighbourhood of a million dollars. While the evidence was far from clear it would appear that the dealers here intend that the banks would also be limited in their leasing activities to vehicles exceeding 46,000 lbs. G.V.W. which would mean in effect that they could only engage in fleet leasing for medium and heavy duty trucks.

(iii) Indirect leasing

This was an area of particular confusion in the evidence. While the expression "indirect leasing" was used by both the banks and the automobile dealers and leasing companies, there is good reason to doubt whether or not some of the types of transactions referred to under this head indeed amount to leasing at all. There were basically two types of indirect leasing as follows:

(a) a transaction in which the dealer negotiates a lease with a prospective lessee, and then borrows from the banks the funds required to acquire the vehicles putting up the lease as collateral security for the loan; and

(b) a form of indirect leasing in which an individual dealer negotiates a lease with a customer and subsequent thereto assigns the lease to the bank with full pay-out to the dealer with the bank taking over the lease as lessor.

It would appear to be clear that the banks and the dealers and leasing companies are in agreement that the first form of indirect leasing above described should continue to be a commercial transaction in which the banks are entitled to engage. Your Committee has considered the legal issue involved and has been advised that the transaction of indirect leasing in which the banks take the lease as collateral security is probably not financial leasing at all. Under the present legislation, and as continued in Bill C-6, the banks are entitled to take all forms of personal property as collateral security for a loan, and where the delivery of the lease is as collateral only, the advice which your Committee has received is that this would not involve the bank in engaging "in financial leasing" as contemplated by the provisions of the Bill.

The second form of indirect leasing outlined above presents greater problems. The dealers take the position that where the banks take an outright assignment from a dealer of the lease, including title to the automobile, they are engaging in a form of one-on-one financial leasing of the type which they have from the beginning conceded was inappropriate for bank related leasing activities. The banks on the other hand take the position that it is imperative that they be permitted to engage in this "assignment" type of lease transaction in order to continue to offer small dealers in more remote areas, who do not engage in commercial vehicle leasing generally, the opportunity to provide to their customers a leased vehicle where their working capital condition would not enable them to carry the lease during its term. The banks take the position that their branch system enables them to provide this service to small dealers who would otherwise not be free to engage in this type of leasing. Unlike the "collateral security" type of indirect leasing your Committee has been advised that the second type of indirect leasing involving an outright assignment of the ownership of the vehicle, and the lease, to the bank clearly would result in the bank engaging in the business of financial leasing because it would be responsible to administer the lease of the vehicle which it now owned.

It is your Committee's view that the outright assignment form of indirect leasing is inconsistent with the banks stated agreement that it ought to stay out of the leasing on a one-to-one basis. It is unclear as to why the small dealer in its leasing requirements could not function under the indirect form of leasing where the banks take as collateral security for the loan of monies necessary to acquire the vehicle, the lease itself.

Attached hereto as Appendix III are proposals by the government described by the Minister of State (Finance) as substantive amendments to Bill C-6. The letter enclosing such package of proposed amendments is addressed to the Chairman of the Commons Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for distributing to members of that Committee. Fortunately, a copy of this material was obtained not from the Office of the Minister but as the result of a request made to the Secretary of the Commons Committee by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which is studying the subject matter of Bill C-6 on the instructions of the Senate. Such proposed amendments described as substantive by the Minister were obviously materially important to the Senate Committee in its study of Bill C-6.

One amendment included in this material proposes an amendment to sub-clause 193(1) of C-6 at page 208 of Bill C-6. This amendment proposes that a bank be prevented from having a leasing subsidiary that leases any motor vehicle capable of being licensed for operation on a public highway and having a gross vehicle weight as that expression is defined in the regulations of less than 21 metric tons (46,000 pounds GVW).

In substance this is the form of amendment requested by the automotive dealers and the leasing companies in their submissions to the government and to the Senate and Commons Committees respectively.

Members of the Senate Committee were concerned that the gross vehicle weight of 46,000 pounds might well overstate the volume area for trucks in which the dealers might have competition in volume and this in their submissions appeared to be of major concern to them.

Attached hereto and marked Appendix IV is a statement of new truck registrations by makes and GVW ratings for the year 1979 compiled by R. L. Polk and Co. Ltd., 220 Bartley Drive, Toronto, Ontario. This statement shows the substantial volume of new truck registrations occur in two areas, namely:

(i) in the area between 6,000 pounds or less GVW rating and

(ii) in the area between 6,001 pounds and 10,000 pounds GVW rating.

The volume above 10,000 pounds is relatively low in comparison and if competition with the banks is feared, it must surely be in the larger volume areas up to 10,000 pounds GVW. This becomes important when considering the weight provision in the proposed amendments on this point of 46,000 pounds GVW or 21 metric tons. This 46,000 pounds GVW is the weight limitation requested by the dealers and leasing companies to protect their operations against competition from the banks which under the Bill would be entitled to operate in this area. The proposed amendment would exclude the banks from operating in the area below 46,000 pounds as requested by the dealers and the leasing companies.

The language of the proposed amendment uses the words "and having a gross vehicle weight as that expression is defined by the regulations of less than 21 metric tons". Heavy tractor trailer trucks operating on the highway may weigh up to 90,000 pounds GVW and should be eligible for dealing in the business of financial leasing by the banks. However, the words of limitation "having a gross vehicle weight . . . of less than 21 metric tons" would require the tractor to be weighed separately from the trailer fully loaded and would, therefore, exclude the banks from operating in this area of financial leasing. To correct this mistake in the application of the words of limitation, there should be added after the words "having a gross vehicle weight" the following: "or a gross combination weight." A tractor is not designed for the direct carriage of goods. It supplies the motor power.

The dealers and leasing companies admitted before the Senate Committee and in their written submission that they preferred to compete with the foreign companies operating in the business of leasing rather than the banks. It would appear that the reason for this attitude is the possibility of the banks being able to establish lower competitive rates. This presents a problem of public interest in removing or lessening competition at the request and for the benefit of a section engaged in carrying on the business of financial leasing.

Circumstances might justify attaching in a proper place conditions or limitations or guidelines for the operation of such a business by particular groups even by the banks. It is difficult, however, to understand the exclusion or virtual exclusion without evidence of the banks as to the extent of the proposed operations by the banks in the field and the extent to which this field is served by the dealers and leasing companies. On the basis of new truck registrations attached is Appendix IV. The substantial competitive area would appear to be up to 10,000 pounds. It is difficult in these circumstances to understand why a virtual exclusion limitation of 46,000 pounds is provided and in that area the banks are excluded from carrying on the business of financial leasing.

Recommendation

Your Committee recommends that the proposed language of Sub-Clause 1 of Clause 193 be rejected in favour of an amendment to prohibit a bank from having a leasing subsidiary that leases any motor vehicle on a one-to-one basis except motor vehicles having a gross vehicle weight or, in the case of tractor trailer combinations, a gross combination weight, of at least 16,000 lbs. GVW; and further prohibits such leasing subsidiary from fleet leasing of vehicles except where the value of the motor vehicle lease is $250,000 or more in a single transaction, or the quantity of vehicles leased is at least 25 in number.

3. Exemption of Cattle from "Section 88" Security

Your Committee heard evidence from the Canadian Cattlemens' Association on the 27th of May 1980. The representatives of this body gave evidence to the effect that the provisions of Clause 178(6) of Bill C-6 would serve to exclude from a "Section 88" form of assignment in favour of a bank certain perishable products of agricultural as therein defined. The evidence was to the effect that the present Bill does not extend this protection to livestock and that serious damage has occurred in the past and is likely to occur in the future to livestock producers who have delivered livestock to a slaughterhouse but have not received payment therefor in circumstances in which pursuant to the terms of a "Section 88" assignment favouring the bank, the operator of the slaughterhouse pledges the cattle before payment is made.

In effect packers enter into "Section 88" types of financing arrangements with the banks in order to fund the acquisition of their inventory of cattle and obtain operating money for processing cattle and since the delivery of the cattle with payment subsequent is a form of extension of credit, the producer has in effect deprived himself of his own security without payment having been made. Where bankruptcy of the packer results the producer ranks after the bank or other secured creditors and often receives no payment for his cattle.

Your Committee considered the question of whether or not the protection which cattlemen obviously require in this area is protection which ought to be provided for in banking legislation. The Livestock and Livestock Products Act R.S.C. 1970, Chapter 18, might well be a more appropriate vehicle for extending protection to producers in this area. This legislation provides for the establishment of marketing schemes for livestock which contemplates ensuring that the producer is not deprived of both his livestock and the remuneration to which he is entitled therefor. Amendments to the Livestock and Livestock Products Act of Ontario in the form of Bill 26, assented to on the 1st of May 1980, illustrate that there are schemes in place in one or more provinces intended to have the same effect. Thus under the provisions of Section 4 of the amending Act in Ontario, livestock dealers are subject to regulations as to the manner of payment for livestock purchased from producers. The existence of legislation of both the Parliament of Canada, and of Provincial Legislatures in this field raises some question as to the constitutional position which it is unnecessary for your Committee, in view of its conclusions to deal with. It is sufficient to observe that if protection in the form of legislation such as the Livestock and Livestock Products legislation is required, it is unlikely to be forthcoming in all 10 provinces simultaneously and thus if justification can be found for providing some limited form of protection in the Bank Act, such form of protection becomes desirable.

Suggestions for change proposed by the Cattlemens' Association contemplate expanding the definition of priority items under Clause 178 to include all products of agriculture. This would have the effect of including livestock. To protect the cattlemen it is not necessary that such a broad coverage be given for other than the cattlemen. Your Committee has received no evidence of the need for protection of such breadth and extending the protection to all products of agriculture is thus unreasonable and unnecessary.

In his proposed amendments to Clause 178(6)(b), tabled in June 1980, the Minister accepts the suggestion of the Canadian Cattlemens' Association and extends the priority position to the claims under this section of all growers and producers of products of agriculture. In addition it provides for increases in the dollar amount used in the multiplier in the formula to calculate the maximum priority claim as set out in Clause 178(6)(b)(ii)(iii) from $100.00 to $400.00. This latter proposal, which was also recommended by the Canadian Cattlemens' Association, would have the effect of increasing the monetary limit of the priority position to the level of approximately $250,000 based on the existing index number of farm prices of agricultural products for Canada published by Statistics Canada. This amendment as well is in line with that sought by the cattlemen. It is worth noting in passing that in earlier reports (See page 46 Report on Bill C-15 March 7, 1979) your Committee has recommended a form of indexing of the upper limit dollar value of the priority amount under section 178(6) and this proposal has not been taken up in the Minister's most recent proposed amendments.

Your Committee has reviewed this matter in some detail and has come to the conclusion that it is desirable both that the definition of priority products be expanded in such a manner as to include cattle, and also that the upper limit of priority claims be increased to take into account contemporary realities.

1. Your Committee recommends that Clause 178(6)(b) of the bill be amended so as to extend the priority outlined in subparagraph (II) afforded to dairy products to include cattle;

2. Your Committee further recommends that Clause 178(6)(b)(ii) be amended so as to alter the multiplier from $100.00 to $400.00 as outlined:

3. Your Committee further recommends that consideration be given to amending the Livestock and Livestock Products Act, R.S.C. 1970, Chapter 18, in such a manner as will produce effective protection for cattlemen who are producers of cattle in respect of payment for cattle sold.

4. Limit on Mortgage Lending by Banks

Section 75(4)(a) of the present Bank Act limits a bank's portfolio of residential mortgages, excluding NHA guaranteed mortgages to ten per cent of the total bank's deposit liabilities payable in Canadian currency and its outstanding bank debentures. Bill C-6 maintains the same limit of ten per cent.

The White Paper on Banking Legislation proposed that the 10 per cent limit be removed, and this was given effect to in Bill C-15. However, Bill C-14 reverted back to the 10 per cent limit for banks, while specifically permitting banks to conduct mortgage lending through a subsidiary mortgage loan corporation without any apparent limit in the Bank Act on the amount of such indirect residential mortgage lending. However, it is required that such bank residential mortgage loan corporation be incorporated under The Loan Companies Act (Federal) or, if an existing corporation, that it has been continued under, and is subject to, the provisions of that Act. These provisions of Bill C-14 have been carried through into Bill C-6.

Your Committee recommended in its report on Bill C-15 that the limit be raised from 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

In view of the representations made by witnesses before this Committee, including the Trust Companies Association of Canada and the Association of Canadian Financial Corporations, your Committee considers it appropriate to refer again to the study prepared by the Economic Council in 1976—"Efficiency and Regulation", to which reference was made in your Committee's Report on Bill C-15.

> At the end of 1974, the banks as a group had used half the capacity permitted them under the constraint. Individual banks have used these mortgage lending powers in different ways and to different degrees. Some have channeled their mortgage lending through subsidiary mortgage loan companies, so that only a fraction of their mortgage holdings show up on their balance sheets. Others are considerably closer to the mortgage ceiling than the banking system as a whole. At the end of 1974, three banks were within two percentage points of their current mortgage ceilings. Thus, while a fairly large unused capacity for mortgage lending exists among banks as a whole, the present ceiling may force certain banks to curtail the rate at which they acquire mortgages and may soon restrict them from further mortgage lending, unless they are prepared to establish a mortgage-holding company. The volume of mortgages held by deposit institutions more than doubled over the period from 1967 to the end of 1974. While the chartered banks' share of the mortgage market rose from 3.7 to 11.3 per cent over this period the combined share of the trust and loan companies and of the credit unions also rose from 24.6 per cent in 1967 to 35.6 per cent by the end of 1974. Data on the rates of return earned by major trust and loan companies during this time suggest that, while the average margin between the return earned on assets and the interest paid on borrowing narrowed over the period, the rate of return on the equity of trust and mortgage loan companies increased as the result of increased debt/equity ratios. From this evidence, we do not believe that the entry of chartered banks jeopardized the viability of other institutions in the mortgage market. On the contrary, entry of the banks eased the problem of financing the unprecedented growth in demand for mortgage credit.

In its hearings on Bill C-6, concern was expressed by the representatives of the Trust Companies Association of Canada that unless some limitation is applied to mortgage loan companies and other bank subsidiaries, the chartered bank limitation will be meaningless and ineffective in maintaining any semblance of competitive balance in the marketplace.

To place the competitive focus in its proper context, it is worth examining the annual growth of Trust Companies' share of the market. Schedules I and II, Appendix A show that residential mortgage loans (including NHA mortgages) held by banks increased from $8,039 million or 12.89% of the market at December 31, 1975 to $18,900 million or 15.9% at December 31, 1979. This is a growth rate of 135% in four years. In the same period, the outstanding residential mortgages held by the trust companies grew from $10,542 million or 16.9% of the market at December 31, 1975 to $25,000 million or 21.1% of the market at December 31, 1979. This is a growth rate of 137% in the same four years.

A study of the other figures on Schedules I and II show that the Trust Companies have increased their share of the total residential mortgage market every year since 1967; this was accomplished in spite of an increase in a substantial share of the market by Credit Unions and Pension Funds, etc.

In Schedule I, the mortgage loans by bank affiliates are included with those of Loan Companies. Further, it should be pointed out that NHA mortgages are included in these statistics and are not broken out separately. It appears doubtful that the concerns of the Trust Companies Association of Canada that they might not be in a position to maintain a competitive position in the market do not appear to be borne out by the information and statistics presented to your Committee.

In its hearings on Bill C-6, concern was expressed by representatives of the Trust Companies Association of Canada that, unless some limitation is extended to include the residential mortgage loans by banks' affiliates, the 10 per cent limit applicable to banks would be meaningless. When the association appeared before your Committee on June 17, 1980 the president stated that their industry, in 1979, "had the capacity to find an additional two billion dollars of mortgage loans." However, even taking this capacity into account, it is apparent that if the 10 per cent limitation were extended to bank subsidiaries, the banks would, on a combined basis, be in excess of 12 per cent of Canadian deposits and debentures. This would effectively eliminate the banks and affiliates from approving additional residential mortgages. In 1979, the banks and their affiliates approved $6.7 billion in residential mortgages. It is obvious from the above that if the combined residential mortgage lending by banks and their affiliates had been frozen, there would have been a short-fall of $4.7 billion dollars even taking into account the Trust Companies unused capacity of $2 billion.

Your Committee believes that some limitation through the Bank Act as to the amount of conventional residential mortgage lending which a bank should be permitted to do through its mortgage loan subsidiary is desirable. However, in view of the necessity of maintaining the strong position of the bank affiliates to provide the mortgage funds to meet the requirements of the demand which would have otherwise resulted in a serious short-fall, your Committee is of the opinion that any controls must be flexible enough not to disrupt the market place.

As at March 21, 1980, the aggregate limit on conventional residential mortgage lending by banks was limited to $12,553 million based on 10 per cent of total Canadian dollar deposits and debentures of $125,529, million (source: Bank of Canada Review, May, 1980). The amount of conventional residential mortgage lending by all banks aggregated $8,354 million. In addition, based on information supplied by the Canadian Bankers' Association, there was lending secured by residential property of approximately $2 billion which would be included within the 10 per cent limit. It would appear therefore that as at March 31, 1980, the aggregate lending by banks, excluding affiliates, had only reached approximately 83 per cent of their limit.

On the other side of the coin, outstanding conventional residential mortgage lending by bank affiliates amounted to $5,146 million at March 31, 1980, which is 4.1 per cent of the banks' total Canadian $ deposits and debentures. The combined aggregate qualifying loans by banks and their affiliates amounted to 12.76 per cent of the aggregate of banks total qualifying liabilities.

Your Committee recommends that amendment be made to Bill C-6 in this area. Based on its consideration of this situation your Committee is of the opinion that, in addition to maintaining the 10 per cent limit on a bank's direct lending, a separate limit of 15 per cent of the bank's Canadian $ deposits and debentures be introduced, on the amount of conventional residential mortgage outstanding in a banks' mortgage loan subsidiary.

Your Committee has carefully considered a number of alternatives for imposing some realistic control over the development of the bank subsidiary's mortgage portfolio in such a manner as to avoid eliminating the subsidiary from residential mortgage lending entirely due to its pre-existing level of activity. A form of grandfathering of the subsidiary's existing residential mortgage loans was analysed but rejected as being potentially inequitable as between various banks in addition to being impractical. To meet the dual requirements of insuring the availability of residential mortgage funds while at the same time preventing the limit of 10% imposed on the banks themselves from being entirely circumvented, your Committee has settled upon the 15% limit for bank subsidiary's as being a practical and workable solution.

In order to maintain equilibrium in the market place, your Committee also suggests that the increase in residential mortgage loans by a bank's mortgage loan subsidiary be phased in over a four-year period, similar to the 1967 phase-in of the present 10 per cent limit for banks under subsection 75(4)(b) of the present Bank Act.

Recommendations

Your Committee recommends:

1. That Bill C-6 be amended to provide:

   (a) That in addition to the limit on a bank's direct conventional residential mortgage lending to 10 per cent of a bank's Canadian currency deposits and debentures as provided in sub-section 2 of section 176 of Bill C-6, the amount of residential mortgage loans from indirect lending by banks mortgage loan subsidiaries (which is set up by sub-sections 1 and 6 of section 193 as being 80% of the principal amount of all mortgages owned by the subsidiary) also be limited to 15% of the banks Canadian currency deposits and debentures.

   (b) That such 15 per cent limit for a bank's mortgage loan subsidiary be phased in over a four year period.

5. Form of Public Review of Application for Incorporation

In your Committee's report in the predecessor Bill C-14, extensive recommendations were made with respect to the desirability of a public form of review of applications by way of Letters Patent for incorporation of new banks. These recommendations which contemplated inter alia, the Inspector General as the reviewing agency, represented the culmination of an indepth study by your Committee of the desirability of public review of Letters Patent for incorporation of new banks which started with your Committee's study of the White Paper. In its review of the White Paper and each successive Bill, your Committee, notwithstanding a pronounced lack of response from the Government, became more convinced of the importance of ensuring that the chartered banking system in this country be safeguarded by public scrutiny of applications for incorporation of new banks, in appropriate circumstances, particularly in the light of the anticipated influx of applicants in the form of subsidiaries of foreign banking corporations.

It is unnecessary to review in detail the stance taken in the case of each successive Bill, and the White Paper. Suffice to say that in response to the most recent Bill in its report of December 5th, 1979, your Committee recommended that there be a form of public review of applications for incorporation in the form of a public hearing "where responsible, legitimately interested members of the public seek a hearing . . . " It recommended a qualified form of ministerial discretion with respect to the selection of occasions where a public hearing is dictated. Further, your Committee's recommendations included provisions as to the form of hearing, its scope, particularly with respect to foreign bank subsidiaries, the jurisdiction of the Inspector General in exercising the delegated authority of the Minister to conduct such a public hearing as well as appeals and a form of licensing review.

Bill C-6 at first reading in April 1980, made no provisions for such a public review of applications for incorporation.

In June of 1980 the Minister of State (Finance), tabled amendments in the Commons Committee to the Bill including a proposed amended Clause 12 to provide for a modified form of such a public review. Clause 12, Page 18, in Bill C-6 requires publication of a notice of intent to make application for incorporation of a new bank, and the amendment of June 1980 insofar as it relates to public review provides as follows:

> "(2) Where any person objects to the issuance of Letters Patent incorporating a bank, he may, within 30 days of the date of the last publication in the Canada Gazette of the notice referred to in sub-section (1) relating to the proposed incorporation, submit his objection in writing to the Inspector.
> (3) Where the Inspector has received an objection pursuant to the sub-section (2), he shall so advise the Minister, and, if the application for the issuance of the Letters Patent to which the objection relates has been received by the Minister, the Inspector shall,
>
> (a) where he is satisfied in his discretion that it is necessary and in the public interest that a public inquiry be made into the objection as it relates to the application, make such a public inquiry; and
> (b) upon completion of the inquiry report his findings thereon to the Minister."

It will be seen therefore that the basic concept recommended by your Committee has been accepted in this proposal. It is true that the circumstances under which a hearing will be held are not precisely the same, nor is there the detail in terms of how the hearing will be conducted and the scope of the Inspector General's jurisdiction as was outlined in the report of the Senate Committee on Bill C-14. Nonetheless, your Committee regards this proposed amendment as something of a breakthrough in this important area and is accordingly prepared to recommend its adoption.

Recommendation

Your Committee recommends that the provision for a public review of applications for incorporation of a bank upon the exercise of the discretion of the Inspector General of Banks and in circumstances in which a notice of objection to the issuance of letters patent incorporating a bank has been received, be approved.

6. Ownership of Banks Shares by Provincial Governments

As was the case under the predecessor Bill C-14, the present Bill contemplates that the existing prohibition against governments owning capital stock in chartered banks be removed and that provincial governments be allowed to hold and vote capital stock of chartered banks up to 25% of the shares of a new bank with such shareholdings being reduced to 10% within 10 years. This concept was included in the White Paper and the succeeding Bills which followed it. Your Committee has been consistent in its opposition to this proposal and has received no information since its hearing in response to Bill C-14 which would serve to alter its conclusion. In its report upon the subject matter of Bill C-14, your Committee observed as follows at page 15:

> "The ownership of significant interests by Provincial Governments in chartered banks is not in the public interest because interests varying from 25% to 10% might well give Provincial Governments effective control of the bank and would bring conventional banking objectives into conflict with the political interests of major substantial Government shareholders."

Notwithstanding repeated inclusion therefore of permissive provisions in succeeding Bills with respect to the ownership of shares by provincial governments in chartered banks your Committee remains opposed to this concept.

Recommendation

Your Committee recommends that the provisions of Bill C-6 that contemplate the ownership of capital stock of chartered banks by provincial governments be deleted.

7. Miscellaneous Technical Amendments

In the full text of Bill C-6 technical and non-substantive changes to the predecessor Bill and the Bank Act have been proposed. Your Committee has caused these changes to be analyzed and has no recommendations to make in connection therewith.

Your Committee has not addressed itself to the Minister's proposed amendments of June 1980, other than those specifically dealt with in this report.

Conclusion

Your Committee wishes to express its appreciation for the services rendered in the Review of the Bill by Messrs. John F. Lewis, C.A. and David W. Scott, Q.C.

Your Committee has examined and considered the subject matter of Bill C-6 in accordance with its terms of reference and, except as noted above, has no comment to make on the Bill.

Respectfully submitted,

APPENDIX III

20 June 1980

The Honourable Bud Cullen, P.C., M.P.,
Chairman,
Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Cullen:

Please find attached the government's proposals for substantive amendments to Bill C-6—The Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980. By these amendments we believe we have resolved the most pressing concerns of Committee members. We hope that it will now be possible for the Committee to approve quickly this important and long delayed legislation.

I would ask you to circulate this material including this letter to all members of the Committee as soon as possible.

The package of proposed amendments consists of the following:

1. Clause 12—page 18

   This amendment provides for the possibility of a public enquiry at the discretion of the Inspector General of Banks in connection with the chartering of banks by letters patent. It follows closely the proposal of Mr. Marcel Lambert with technical changes suggested by the Department of Justice.

2. Subclause 174(5)—page 170

   This amendment establishes for the first time in the Bank Act the right of the individual to prepay a consumer loan.

3. Clause 174—page 173

   This amendment is consequential on the previous one and delays its effect for six months after the coming into force of this section to give the banks time to inform their branches and, if necessary, prepare new forms and advertising material.

4. Subclause 178(6)—page 187

   This amendment extends a priority position to the claims under this section of all growers and producers of products of agriculture and increases the dollar amount used in the formula to calculate maximum prior claim from "one hundred dollars" to "four hundred dollars".

5. Subclause 178(7)—page 188

   This is a consequential amendment arising out of the previous amendment.

6. Subclause 193(1)—page 208

   This amendment prevents a bank from having a leasing subsidiary that leases any motor vehicle capable of being licensed for operation on a public highway and weighing less than twenty-one metric tons.

7. Subclause 202(8)—page 223

   This amendment allows the Minister to make regulations prohibiting or limiting any charge or penalty referred to in the section, prescribing the method of calculating the amount of rebate of the cost of borrowing and prohibiting the use of any other method.

It is the Minister's intention to introduce regulations that would prohibit penalties for consumer loans except mortgage loans. It is also his intention to notify the banks that the use of the Rule of 78's will be prohibited in two years. This will give the banks time to institute computer systems to enable them to phase out entirely the use of the Rule of 78's.

8. Subclauses 303(2) and (3)—pages 305 and 306

   It has been brought to our attention that these clauses have been drafted so stringently that Canadian corporations might be caught inadvertently by them. Three problems have arisen in these subclauses that the amendments seek to correct. First, it is the intention of the Bill in this and other sections that a bank should not own more than 10 per cent of the voting rights attached to shares of another corporation (unless permitted by law). The drafting in this section assumes that each voting share has one vote. This is not always the case and consequently the subclauses have been redrafted to reflect the intent. Second, subsection 303(2) in defining a "corporation associated with a foreign bank" associates a foreign bank and any corporation in which that bank owns more than ten per cent of any class of shares of the corporation. This wording is now felt to be far too broad as it covers both voting and non-voting shares. In the case of non-voting shares it is not unusual for preferred share issues of Canadian corporations to be underwritten by foreign banks who, as a result of such underwriting, could in some cases, end up with more than ten per cent of a class of these non-voting shares. Thus only because of a financing arrangement, Canadian corporations could be "associated" with a foreign bank and a subsidiary of the "associated" corporation could become a non-bank affiliate.

   The legislation was not intended to have the effect described above. The Department of Justice drafting experts have produced an amendment to subsection 303(2) that retains the ten per cent measurement with relation to voting shares, but establishes a higher limit of twenty-five per cent for non-voting shares.

   Third, subsection 303(3) provides for a cut-down of votes held by an associated corporation in another corporation to a deemed figure for the purpose of determining the votes relating to that corporation that the associated corporation can vote for purpose of subsections (1) and (6). (For example, Foreign Bank owns 12% of Canadian Company A which in turn owns 50% of Canadian Company B. By the cut-down, Foreign Bank is deemed to control 12/100 of 50/100 or 6% of the voting rights of Canadian Company B.) No such cut-down arrangement exists for subclause 305(1) (b). There is no reason for the different treatment so it is proposed to amend subclause 303(3) to have it apply to subclause 305(1).

9. Subclause 303(6)—pages 306 and 307

Subclause 303(6) refers to "shares of a class of shares" but should refer to voting rights as explained above in relation to the amendment to subclauses 303(2) and (3).

10. Finally, the last item is a note indicating my intention to have the Department of Justice draft amendments that would increase and improve the availability of certain financial and other information along the lines suggested in some of Mr. Rae's amendments. These amendments when drafted will protect the privacy of client-bank affairs.

Yours sincerely,

Pierre Bussières

Inquiry into objection

(3) Where the Inspector has received an objection pursuant to subsection (2), he shall so advise the Minister and, if the application for the issuance of the letters patent to which the objection relates has been received by the Minister, the Inspector shall,
(a) where he is satisfied in his discretion that it is necessary and in the public interest that a public inquiry be made into the objection as it relates to the application, make such a public inquiry; and
(b) upon completion of the inquiry, report his findings thereon to the Minister."

When corporation associated with foreign bank

(2) For the purposes of this section, a corporation is associated with a foreign bank if,

(a) more than fifty per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of any class of shares of the corporation are owned, directly or indirectly, by a person or group of persons who act in concert and who own, directly or indirectly, more than ten per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of any class of shares of the foreign bank,

(b) more than ten per cent of the total votes could, under the voting rights attached to all the shares of the corporation issued and outstanding, be voted under the voting rights attached to the shares of the corporation owned, directly or indirectly, by the foreign bank,

(c) it is a corporation not associated with the foreign bank under paragraph (a) or (b) but is a non-bank affiliate of the foreign bank, or

(d) more than twenty-five per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of any class of non-voting shares of the corporation are owned, directly or indirectly, by the foreign bank, and a corporation may be associated with more than one foreign bank.

(3) Where a corporation (in this subsection referred to as an ("associated corporation") is associated with a foreign bank by reason of paragraph (2)(b), the percentage of votes that the associated corporation is permitted to vote, under the voting rights attached to the shares of a corporation incorporated by or under a law of Canada or a province and carrying on business in Canada owned by the associated corporation, is deemed for the purposes of subsections (1) and (6) and paragraph 305(1)(b) to be the percentage obtained by multiplying the actual percentage of the total votes, under the voting rights attached to all the shares of the corporation incorporated by or under a law of Canada or a province and carrying on business in Canada issued and outstanding, that could be voted under the voting rights attached to the shares of such corporation owned by the associated corporation by the actual percentage of the total votes, under the voting rights attached to all the shares of the associated corporation issued and outstanding, that could be voted under the voting rights attached to the shares of the associated corporation owned, directly or indirectly, by the foreign bank.

Prohibition against issue and registration of shares

"(6) When a corporation, other than a foreign bank subsidiary, is a corporation incorporated by or under a law of Canada or a province and doing business in Canada and is engaged in the business of both lending money and accepting deposit liabilities transferable by cheque or other instrument, such corporation shall refuse to issue or register in the securities register of the corporation a transfer of any share of a class of voting shares of the corporation to a foreign bank or a corporation associated with a foreign bank,

(a) if, when the voting rights attached to the shares of the corporation owned by the foreign bank and by other corporations associated with it, if any, exceed ten per cent of the total votes that could, under the voting rights attached to all the shares of the corporation issued and outstanding, be voted by the holders thereof, the issue or transfer would increase the percentage of the voting rights attached to the shares of the corporation owned by the foreign bank and by other corporations associated with it, if any; or

(b) if, when the voting rights attached to the shares of the corporation owned by the foreign bank and by other corporations associated with it, if any, are ten per cent or less of the total votes that could, under the voting rights attached to all the shares of the corporation issued and outstanding, be voted by the holders thereof, the issue or transfer would cause the percentage of the voting rights attached to the shares of the corporation owned by the foreign bank and by other corporations associated with it, if any, to exceed ten per cent of the total votes that could, under the voting rights attached to all the shares of the corporation issued and outstanding, be voted by the holders thereof."
